"He constantly sought new ways of teaching [and] ways of making things easier to understand, so that his students could absorb and retain more knowledge," said Schonblum.

Gwosdy was "a fantastic teacher and a great administrator," said school co-founder and co-administrator Doreen Goldberg, who was married to Gwosdy for 31 years. (The marriage ended in divorce.)

At home, every day was a learning experience, said Gwosdy's son Elliott, who still has election scrapbooks he began putting together at his father's behest in 1979.

Gwosdy received his own Jewish education at a downtown Toronto cheder. He later majored in religious studies at Waterloo Lutheran University, and received his MEd at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

As a young man he did voice-overs and commercials for radio and television, and in 1961 wrote the book Official Hockey, meticulously tracing the careers of every NHL player – without benefit of a computer.

In the 1980s, he worked for a time as a stockbroker before returning to teaching, and wrote a weekly financial column for the North York Mirror.

Gwosdy had an eclectic range of interests, many of which were subjects of his carefully catalogued video collection.

Until January, when he went on disability leave, he taught English as a Second Language at Sprucecourt Public School.

Despite multiple health problems, including post-polio syndrome that made it difficult for him to walk, Gwosdy had the ability to keep students "enchanted," said Maureen Coleman, his partner for the past seven years, herself a teacher. "He didn't let up. He didn't stop being inventive."

Marrus' career changes course

With this article, Sheldon Kirshner launches a new beat covering Canadian academics whose work and careers will be highlighted from time to time.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Marrus, an internationally renowned historian, has changed course, shifting from scholarship to administration.

Michael Marrus

Last year, the University of Toronto named Marrus – a specialist in the Holocaust – dean of its School of Graduate Studies, the largest in Canada. He thereby became the 14th person, and the third Jew after Ernest Sirluck and Jon Cohen, to hold the position.

It is an awesome responsibility. The School of Graduate Studies has 10,000 students, 17 centres and institutes and more than 100 programs in the humanities, social sciences, life sciences and physical sciences.

Leaning back in a chair as he talked, Marrus, 57, described his new job as "extraordinarily demanding."

"I work every waking hour," he said with a slight grimace, adding that he has accommodated himself to his new role by lightening his teaching load and curtailing his research activities.

Nowadays, Marrus teaches only one course, on the Holocaust. In the past, when administration was not the raison d'être of his professional duties, he also lectured on fascism and World War II.

"My research has taken a significant beating since I assumed this job," said Marrus, the author of, among other works, The Holocaust in History, Vichy France and the Jews (with Robert Paxton), Mr. Sam: The Life and Times of Samuel Bronfman and The Unwanted: European Refugees in the Twentieth Century.

Nonetheless, Marrus is still very much a scholar. Currently, he is preparing a lecture series on the Vatican and the Holocaust for Holy Blossom Temple, Clark University in Massachusetts and the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Library in New York State. As well, the Bulletin of the History of Medicine is publishing his monograph, The Nuremberg Doctors' Trial in Historical Context.

Marrus, who holds graduate and post-graduate degrees from the University of Toronto and the University of California at Berkeley, is a prolific writer. He has written for academic journals, including the Canadian Journal of History and the American Historical Review. And his analytical pieces and reviews have appeared in the New Republic, the New York Times, the Washington Post, the Globe and Mail and the Times Literary Supplement, among other publications.

Despite his credentials as a scholar, Marrus is hardly a novice in administrative matters, having been a governor of the university and chair of its academic senate.

He accepted the deanship for broadly two reasons. He viewed it as an opportunity "to help shape the direction of academic life" at the U of T. And, feeling somewhat restless, he sought a fresh challenge.

Marrus, to whom four associate deans, a vice-dean and more than 40 administrative and secretarial employees report, feels that the hallmark of higher education in the 1990s is accountability.

"The days of the ivory tower are long gone," he noted. "We don't want to be self-satisfied and self-contained. We are constantly testing ourselves to see if we can do better."

In line with his philosophy, he is improving existing programs, developing new ones (student internships) and putting more emphasis on inter-disciplinary courses. He is also seeking funding for additional fellowships.

Marrus, who has been associated with the U of T since 1968, was acting director of the Jewish studies program in the mid-1970s, and today he sits on the advisory board of its chair of Jewish studies. The university, he said, has experienced "significant growth" in the field of Jewish studies. Currently, it is trying to recruit professors for its newly established chairs of medieval Jewish history and Israeli studies.

Much to his regret, neither the U of T nor any other university in Canada has an endowed chair in Holocaust studies. But there has been progress. When Marrus, a Torontonian, was a student, the Holocaust received only passing mention in school texts.

In his view, the Adolph Eichmann trial in Israel stamped the Holocaust with the imprimatur of academic importance.

But he believes that the explosion of popular and scholarly interest in the Holocaust would have been impossible without the publication of three seminal books dealing with perpetrators, victims and bystanders: The Destruction of the European Jews by Raul Hilberg Judenrat by Isaiah Trunk; and While Six Million Died by Arthur Morse.

Daniel Goldhagen's best-seller, Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust, does not impress him. He considers it "a very poor, repetitive and jargon-filled" tome which utterly fails to substantiate its thesis that the Germans, in particular, had a predisposition toward wanton cruelty and mass murder.

Are Jews obsessed by the Holocaust? "The Holocaust was an event that would have traumatized any group," he observed. "The Jewish world is still in the process of mourning. There's a great deal of anguish and despair, and this doesn't always lead to balance and a sense of proportion. Yet Jews have admirably come to grips with the Holocaust."

As for Holocaust deniers, Marrus characterizes them as "malevolent anti-Semites" on the margins of society who crave media attention. In his opinion, Holocaust denial, while certainly a problem, is not of great long-term significance.

He deeply regrets that a climate of "intolerance and anger" recently forced his American colleague and friend, John Roth, to turn down the directorship of the Centre for Advanced Holocaust Studies at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. Roth came under fire following a report that he had written a newspaper article in 1988 comparing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to Nazi Germany's treatment of Jews.

As a member of its Holocaust advisory council, Marrus recently advised the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa to drop the idea of building a Holocaust gallery. "The Holocaust is an event of colossal significance, like the French Revolution or World War I," he observed. "The framework of Canadian military history would have been too narrow to encompass it."

Coming from a person like Marrus, the argument is convincing.

Tenants appeal ruling against condo sukkot

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A last-minute flurry of activity last week allowed a handful of tenants at Le Sanctuaire du Mont-Royal condominium complex to appeal a recent Quebec Superior Court ruling barring them from erecting their own sukkot.

The appeal to the Quebec Court of Appeal will be taken on pro bono by the firm of Segal, Laforest, El Masri, with lawyers Jean El Masri and Serge Segal in charge.

The appeal was made on the last day possible following a permanent injunction that was issued against the tenants on June 5.

It may have important implications for religious and civil rights. Regardless of the outcome at the Quebec Court of Appeal level, the issue may wind up in the Supreme Court of Canada for final adjudication.

Parties involved had said that an appeal was not likely because of lack of time and high legal costs.

"It looks like there's not going to be an appeal," the tenants' lawyer, Alan Adel, told The CJN on June 29.

But some members of the Jewish community were so outraged by the permanent injunction that last Tuesday, with the Canada Day holiday and 30-day deadline for appealing approaching, several people, including at least one lawyer, said they were willing to get involved or raise funds for an appeal.

Thomas Klein, one of the condo owners involved in the case who spent almost $50,000 fighting the injunction with another tenant, Gabriel Fonfeder, seemed almost jubilant at the turn of events.

"I feel very happy the Jewish community is rallying around this thing," he said in an interview last Thursday. "Before, we felt very much alone."

Moïse Amselem, one of the defendants in the case, said that Rochon's ruling was a catastrophe for the tenants who wanted to erect their own sukkot.

He added that his children were so upset by the ruling that his family is now considering moving out of the complex.

Klein said his family was definitely leaving Le Sanctuaire. It was a decision already made before the sukkah case, but one that was "accelerated" by the injunction, he said.

Segal said last Friday that "as lawyers dealing with fundamental rights on an almost every day basis," his firm was "appalled" by the Superior Court judgment.

In his ruling, Superior Court Judge André Rochon said, essentially, that because the plaintiff in the case, Le Sanctuaire's co-owners association, Syndicat Northcrest, seemed ready to "reasonably accommodate" the defendants by accepting a "common" sukkah, there was no violation of religious rights as defined in the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Rochon also dismissed the defence position that the condo complex's bylaws were applied "selectively" because objects such as Christmas decorations and satellite dishes have been tolerated on the balconies, but sukkot were not. The complex's bylaws, agreed to by its residents, bars any structures other than garden furniture from being put up on balconies or terraces.

Two rabbis, Barry Levy and Moïse Ohana, testified respectively for the Syndicat and for the defence.

But while both rabbis agreed that individual sukkot were not halachically mandatory, Rochon said Rabbi Ohana's view that a common sukkah would make celebrating Sukkot too onerous for some to enjoy in the proper spirit was too subjective.

The appeal is expected to deal with the question of whether the court can consider and rely upon religious law, in this case, Halachah, rather than on merely the sincerity of a litigant's religious beliefs, to determine the extent of the protection of religious rights in the Quebec Charter.

It is also possible that other arguments made in Superior Court will be repeated in the Quebec Court of Appeal: that the condominium complex's bylaws were applied in a discriminatory fashion by allowing other objects other than lawn furniture; and that Syndicat Northcrest did not prove "serious and irreparable prejudice," which the Quebec Civil Code now states is necessary for a permanent injunction to be granted.

B'nai Brith's (BB) League for Human Rights is expected to continue to act as intervener in the case. BB Quebec director, Robert Libman said he hopes the cost will be defrayed through Jewish community contributions.

CJC urges insurers, museums to check for Holocaust victims' assets

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) will communicate shortly with museums and insurance industry representatives in Canada to ensure they are not holding any assets belonging to Holocaust survivors.

This development comes in the wake of consultations which CJC president Moshe Ronen and national executive director Jack Silverstone held with the World Jewish Congress (WJC) while attending the recent annual board meeting in Jerusalem of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Ronen said CJC will urge the insurance industry to establish a high level committee to ensure that an audit is undertaken promptly and effectively.

In addition, he noted that CJC plans to contact the associations representing museums and curators to ensure that no looted works of art found their way into Canadian galleries, other institutions or collections.

Ronen stated that the Bank of Canada should serve as a role model in this area. When it was alleged last summer that the central bank had been party, by means of a paper transfer, to a complex move involving six tons of gold shuffled between Switzerland and Portugal in 1942, CJC immediately called for an investigation.

Bank of Canada Governor Gordon Thiessen responded by appointing Prof. Duncan McDowall of Carleton University to undertake an intensive archival survey.

McDowall concluded there had been no wrongdoing. Furthermore, the Bank of Canada already makes information about dormant accounts from chartered banks and financial institutions available to the public on microfiche.

At the Claims Conference's annual meeting, the CJC delegation urged that a recently announced compensation package be made more equitable by enabling all Holocaust survivors, regardless of income, to benefit. [CJN, July 9]

Ronen extended an invitation to the president of the Claims Conference, Rabbi Israel Miller, and executive vice-president Saul Kagan to visit Canada.

Upon the conclusion of the conference, Ronen was invited to a private meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who congratulated the CJC president on his recent election.

Netanyahu also expressed his appreciation to the Canadian Jewish community for its solidarity with Israel over the last 50 years.

While in Israel Ronen and Silverstone also attended meetings of the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture, which serves as a living memorial to the Jewish victims of the Holocaust. Its purpose is to help fund scholarship and research on Jewish themes.

New home for JCC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Jewish Community Centre (JCC) of Ottawa will soon be relocating. Along with the excitement and anticipation associated with the move to a brand new, state of the art facility is a feeling of nostalgia for the old site.

In order to bring a sense of fun to the move, and to enable all community members and former community members to say a "proper" good-bye, the JCC's "Last Dance" is being organized for Sept. 6.

Co-sponsored by the JCC and Beth Shalom Synagogue (which is, and will remain, at the same location, 151 Chapel St.), the dance will re-create the atmosphere of the '50s and '60s. Both a live band and a disc jockey will play music from that era.

According to committee member Phyllis Leith, the prizes and refreshments will be reminiscent of the "good old days."

"We are trying to reach all former Ottawans who grew up coming down to the JCC. We would like them to come and be a part of it," says Leith.

The dance will be held from 2 to 6 p.m. at 151 Chapel St. For further details or ticket information, call the JCC at 613-789-1818.

ICC treaty singles out Israel: critics

"Given that the United Nations passed a resolution equating Zionism with racism, I have grave concerns about [the provision]," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "It's something we'll have to fight out as we have other issues concerning Israel."

"To equate the establishment of schools and kindergartens in the West Bank with the murder of six million Jews at the hands of the Nazis or the ethnic cleansing that took place in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda insults the memory of the victims of these horrific crimes," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Despite their reservations at the provision, the Canadian Jewish groups welcomed the creation of the world court.

"Obviously it's a necessity if there is going to be justice in the world," Littman said. "It sends a clear signal to all countries that genocide and ethnic cleansing will no longer be accepted forms of political behavior."

"The Canadian Jewish community has for many years supported the establishment of an ICC," Ronen said. Congress informed Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy – who travelled to Rome to lobby for an ICC – that "we welcome this initiative," Ronen said.

Meanwhile, human rights activist Irwin Cotler, another strong proponent of the ICC, criticized Jewish groups for not being in Rome during the deliberations that created the court. Several non-governmental organizations (NGOs) like Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch were instrumental in pushing for an international court as well as for the recently passed land mines treaty. Despite Jewish history, Jewish NGOs were "outside the process," he said.

Although a delegate was present from the U.S. B'nai Brith organization, Cotler referred specifically to the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and to CJC as two groups that could have been there.

Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive director and legal counsel, said Congress does not normally seek inclusion in a Canadian delegation to international conferences such as the one in Rome.

"We don't have the financial resources to participate in long-duration international conferences," he said.

Calls to the WJC were not returned.

Israel was one of only seven states – including the United States, China and India – that voted against the ICC, which received the support of 120 countries. Spokespeople for the United States said they were concerned that U.S. soldiers serving abroad would be hauled before the court on politically motivated charges.

Israeli analysts roundly condemned the population transfer provision, with the Jerusalem Post's Internet Edition (JPIE) headlining its story on it as "Another UN obscenity."

"We completely support the sacred mission of bringing war criminals to justice. No right-thinking individual could doubt the need to bring to trial those who perpetrated genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes… During the conference, it became clear that the Arab delegations intended to promote a clause [on transferring populations]… Over time, this has become a stick with which to beat the Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza," he said.

Rubinstein pointed out that under the Rome treaty, any Israeli involved in the decision to create settlements could be arrested in another country and brought before the court.

Other Israeli legal analysts, while condemning the provision, suggested the West Bank settlements would not come under terms of the treaty. An editorial in the JPIE argues that the settlements are not illegal. The Fourth Geneva Convention that originally dealt with such population transfers referred to forced transfers – not the case in the West Bank. Furthermore, Israel does not occupy the territories, "since that term applies to controlling territory that was captured from another country in a war of aggression. Judea and Samaria were not legally part of any country, but were unallocated portions of the British mandate and in any case, were captured by Israel in a defensive war," the analysis argued.

Ambassador Morris Abram, chair of UN Watch, a Geneva-based NGO, suggested the population transfer clause would be used "inevitably as a hammer against Israel and Israel alone."

Abram, who served on the prosecutor's staff during the postwar Nuremburg trials, said given Israel's treatment by the international community, the clause "will make it possible for the [Israeli] prime minister and others to be hauled before an international court for reasons that are political."

Esmat Abdel Meguid, secretary general of the Arab League, said the resolution creating the court "regards Israeli settlements in occupied lands as a war crime," JTA reported.

War orphans hold reunion

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG — Seventy people, the last of some 130 Holocaust survivors brought here by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) from 1947 to 1949 as war orphans, met recently for a 50th anniversary reunion.

The war orphans, their families and friends spent three days reminiscing, celebrating and poring over old photographs, at the reunion held recently.

The Winnipeg war orphans have held reunions about every five years since 1972. "I've come to every [one]," says Michael Kutz, a Montrealer. "We have no family. This is our family."

Kutz was 10 ½ in 1941, when he "crawled out of a mass grave" near his hometown of Neiswitz in eastern Poland. Nazi collaborators had shot the rest of his family and other local Jews.

A Catholic farmer in the area hid him for several months, and Kutz later joined the partisans.

"From a city of 8,000 Jews, I was one of only 14 survivors.

"We were a very large group, about 50 boys and girls," he remembered of his 1948 ocean voyage to Halifax on the Nea Hellas.

In Winnipeg, the Glassman family at 379 Scotia St., parents of current Winnipeg Free Press restaurant critic Marion Warhaft, took in the 16 year old, one of 1,123 war orphans the CJC brought to Canada from Europe after the war.

Shortly after he arrived, he took part in a Yiddish show at the Playhouse Theatre to raise money to help other war orphans. About a year after his arrival, Kutz moved to Montreal, seeking better job opportunities.

Also at the reunion were Thelma Edwards, 92, who was director of the United Hebrew Social Service Bureau that brought the orphans to Winnipeg after they arrived in eastern Canada, and Rose Hochman Parker, who was a social worker for that bureau. She met the orphans as they arrived in Toronto or Montreal by train from Halifax. Jeanette Grosney Block, also at the reunion, was a social work student under Parker's supervision.

"They told me they were ready to kiss the ground, because they had been able to get into Canada," said Edwards, now a resident of Phoenix, Ariz.

"They looked fine. On the trip to Winnipeg, they were all anxious, wondering what would be done with them. I was able to reassure them." Parker recalled having to use a lot of sign language as she escorted groups by train to Winnipeg.

"The language was a problem, because they couldn't speak Yiddish or English."

Edwards and others at the reunion remembered the late John Hirsch, one of the war orphans who headed to Winnipeg and later became the first artistic director of the Manitoba Theatre Centre.

"I remember looking at a map of Canada with him," says David Erhlich. "He said, 'Winnipeg is right in the centre of the country, close to Chicago, between New York and Los Angeles.' Little did he know how cold it is."

Eugene Joseph talked about the train trip that started in Halifax and continued to Winnipeg after stopovers in Montreal or Toronto.

"After about two days, we thought they were taking us to Siberia. There was no end to it. How could you imagine travelling for two days on a train in one country, and not seeing anything?"

Jack Weiss, who arrived in Winnipeg in 1948, was escorted with other war orphans from Italy to Winnipeg by a Mrs. Lions, and a Miss Tessler, two social workers. The CJC paid the war orphans' room and board with local Jewish families until the orphans, then mostly aged 16 to 18, got jobs; CJC also helped them find work.

Erlich said, "I hoped on the way to Winnipeg that some rich family would adopt me, like you would a dog, and I'd live happily ever after. It never happened. We had to go to work for 50 cents an hour."

Barry Klein travelled from his home in Caracas, Venezuela to attend the 50th anniversary reunion in Winnipeg. He said many war orphans wanted to go to Montreal or Toronto, but he and some of his buddies chose Winnipeg.

"We had no idea where it was. I loved Winnipeg. We were invited every Friday night for dinner with different families. Everyone got a job. We made many friends. And girls, let me tell you. We can never pay back Canadian Jewish Congress for what they did for us."

Shalom Village treats dementia patients

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Contrary to popular perception, people with dementia are capable of learning, according to Lori Shindel Martin, the recently appointed director of education for Shalom Village.

A lot of work has been done to help people with dementia develop the capacity to learn, meaning, she explained in a recent interview, that people with dementia can be helped to relearn their forgotten living skills.

The greatest thing is to help them engage in some activity, she said, especially activities that allow them to use their hands. Looking at pictures and using various props may help them recapture memories, while talking with them may help them remember things that had been important to them and thus reawaken their interest and even their capacity for enjoyment.

Also, rather than use medication and restraints to control agressiveness or other behavioral problems, Shindel Martin suggested that skillful handling by educated staff can significantly reduce such problems.

A nurse specialist in psychiatry, gerontology and dementia care, with undergraduate degrees in nursing from McMaster University and in anthropology and sociology from Guelph University, a master's degree from d'Youville College in Buffalo and work experience in various institutions, including the geriatric care hospital, St. Peter's Hospital in Hamilton, Shindel Martin explained that her primary role at Shalom Village, is "staff development and working with caregivers to advance their practice."

In the future, "there will be more and more complexity in elder care," and it is important, she said, for staff to have the necessary education.

"Staff must be flexible, tender and interested."

They must learn to interpret the needs of patients who are unable to articulate them: help them feel they are not alone by "engaging them on a personal level with a touch," if, for instance, they happen to meet while walking along a corridor.

Also, it's important to help staff cope when approached by a resident in anger, anger, she explained, that often stems from fear and frustration.

She was impressed, Shindel Martin said, that Shalom Village staff "have the capacity to stop what they are doing in an instant when they perceive a person's need."

She considers herself privileged to be able to work at Shalom Village, whose philosophy of care has impressed her. She hopes to "expand the environment [by using] music and reminiscence groups, attuning residents with the seasons and the religious calendar, and extending relationships with volunteers.

"Music, friends and family are all profound influences that must be incorporated," she said.

PA has no plans to resume pullback talks

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In a last-minute reversal last Sunday Palestinian Authority (PA) officials said that there are no plans to resume direct negotiations about the pullback .

The officials said after a meeting in Gaza with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat that they are still waiting for an Israeli offer that would be consistent with the U.S. proposal calling for a 13 percent IDF redeployment in the West Bank.

The Palestinian decision Sunday came after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu indicated to the cabinet that he had authorized both Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani to hold separate talks with Mahmoud Abbas, chief aide to Yasser Arafat.

Mordechai and Abbas met to discuss new ways of energizing the peace talks. Israeli officials had said that both Mordechai and Kahalani were to meet meet Abbas Monday.

PA spokesman Saeb Erekat said he would hold talks with Kahalani—not about the pullback, but about Palestinian demands for the release of security prisoners; Israeli security measures; problems of Palestinian laborers; and other peripheral matters, such as the opening of an airport in the Gaza Strip and safe passage between the Strip and the West Bank.

Erekat also said, however, that during the Mordechai-Abbas meeting, Mordechai had given Abbas some new ideas. According to television reports, Abbas found Mordechai's proposals to be "very interesting."

The television reported that Abbas, referring to Israel's proposal to turn some of the 13 percent withdrawal area into a nature reserve, said that the Palestinians would object to "making [their territory] into a mosaic," and would prefer it all be in one spot.

Mordechai replied that the proposed reserve would be in the Judean Desert, the report said.

Abbas also said the Palestinians would not convene their national council to vote on repealing their covenant, the report said. Mordechai reportedly replied: "We will find a formula."

Palestinian opposition groups have criticized the PA decision to resume negotiations with Israel. Opposition representatives said they had urged Arafat not to reverse his decision last week to end the talks.

During Sunday's cabinet meeting, Netanyahu clarified Kahalani's and Mordechai's respective roles in a review of the government's contacts with the PA, and went on to justify Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky's decision to opt out of a previously scheduled meeting with Arafat.

An official source said reports to the effect that the prime minister rebuked Sharansky for standing up Arafat were "false."

Controversy also was generated by Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein's criticism of Kahalani for his highly publicized session with Arafat.

Edelstein said it is inappropriate for a minister to seek Arafat's opinions "and then listen to his assessment of the prime minister – all the more so at a time when the defence minister is working, with government approval, on advancing the peace process."

Netanyahu stressed that Kahalani's meeting with Arafat was "fully coordinated" with him, but noted that it "was not held for the sake of conducting negotiations, but only to present positions."

Netanyahu said he has not deviated from his position that the Palestine National Council must delete the Palestinian Covenant's anti-Israel clauses, refuting the media reports that Mordechai would agree for this to be done in an alternative fashion.

Israel's defence minister warns:

IDF needs more money

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said Sunday that if the Defence Ministry's budget is not given an additional NIS 2 billion on top of the NIS 34b proposed for next year, the entire defence establishment will collapse.

In a letter written to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Mordechai said that for the past two years his ministry was promised that the annual cut was a one-time action aimed to spur growth, and that the defence budget would grow in the future.

The letter, first publicized Sunday on Israel Radio, said that the growing shortfall is not only threatening the investment in advanced weapons and technology to combat increased threats over the next decade, but is shaking the foundations of the defence establishment itself.

"The main conclusion of the Defence Ministry and the IDF is that the defence budget is nearing collapse," Mordechai was quoted as writing.

The letter went on to explain how a non-partisan group of economists confirmed the Defence Ministry's assessments and concluded that the current budget "will bring the defence establishment to financial collapse."

Copies of the letter were sent to the Finance Ministry and the chief of General Staff.

Mordechai's spokesman Avi Benayahu confirmed the contents of the letter and said it was dated June 4.

Its publication now does not detract from its importance, he said, adding that this is the first time a defence minister has ever warned of a "collapse" if the budget is not increased.

The Defence Ministry's demands come at a time of deep recession and minute growth. The ministry accounts for about 15 percent of the NIS 215 billion shekel national budget and is the largest slice of the financial pie.

The Treasury replied by saying the defence budget has risen over the past year by about 1 percent. They said that the increase demanded by Mordechai, which is equivalent to about 8 percent of the entire defence budget would confound all the balance sheets of the proposed budget and set back the attempts to spur growth.

Treasury budget director David Milgrom told Israel Radio Sunday that everyone is asking for more money and it is impossible to increase all ministry budgets.

Islamic conclave to discuss Jerusalem

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Foreign Ministry has launched an intensive campaign to allay the potential damage to relations with the Arab states that could ensue from the Islamic conference on Jerusalem, due to open in Morocco this week.

Officially known as the Committee on Jerusalem and permanently chaired by Morocco's King Hassan, the conclave is expected to focus on the government's plan to expand the Jerusalem Municipality's administrative area – and to come up with retaliatory measures against it.

"One of the most disturbing consequences could be a call for a halt to normalization of relations with Israel," a senior official said.

Referring to the urban expansion scheme, the official said "it is being used as a pretext for an anti-Israel resolution."

If implemented, it could lead to the closing of the various trade offices opened in Tel Aviv by Arab states which do not have full relations with Israel, and the shutdown of Israeli trade missions to the North African and Persian Gulf states.

The 16-nation body, which includes Arab and non-Arab states, also will be urged to support the convening of an international conference on the Middle East peace process, an initiative proposed by France and Egypt.

This proposal was turned down last week by Syrian President Hafez Assad during his state visit to Paris.

50 Years Ago

TEL AVIV, July 9 — The Palestine war broke out anew today as the four-week United Nations truce expired this morning and Arab and Jewish armies locked in combat. Early today Tel Aviv was subjected to air bombing, while Haifa had a 10-minute air alert during which no bombs were dropped. Three Jews, including two children, were killed and eight wounded when one of the bombs dropped on Tel Aviv struck a farm school on the city's northern outskirts.

Only one plane was involved in the air raid. It was identified as an Egyptian Spitfire. Iraqi planes struck at Jewish positions surrounding Jenin southeast of Haifa.

Deportation was seen as a death sentence

A week before the announcement of the deportations, rumors had already spread in the ghetto and the Jews were gripped with terror. Czerniakow asked the Nazi officials for an explanation, but received only denials.

On July 22 at 7:30 a.m., Czerniakow, along with the members of the Judenrat, were told that the deportations were to begin the next day – Tisha b'Av – and the expulsions would include children. He immediately understood the gravity of such an order and that his previous policy of cooperation with the Germans was a grievous error. This was an order he refused to sign, since it was one his conscience could not live with.

The night following the first deportation, he took the cyanide he had kept with him. He left the following note to the Jewish council: "I am powerless, my heart trembles in sorrow and compassion. I can no longer bear all this. My act will show everyone the right thing to do."

The diary, A Cup of Tears, by Abraham Lewin, offers the following description of the events that occurred on July 23: "Disaster after disaster, misfortune after misfortune. The small ghetto has been turned out on to the streets…The people were driven from 42-44 Muranowska St. during the night… Rain has been falling all day. Weeping. The Jews are weeping. They are hoping for a miracle. The expulsion is continuing. Buildings are blockaded."

Chaim Kaplan, in his diary on the Warsaw Ghetto, foresaw the doom that awaited the Jews of Warsaw with the issuance of the decree. He described the decree as "the total destruction of the Jewish nation." He cites several signs – all ominous – and surmises that the deportations can only be a death sentence and those who deny it, "grasp at straws."

In a July 26 entry, Kaplan writes, "We, the inhabitants of the Warsaw Ghetto, are now experiencing the reality. Our good fortune is that our days are numbered – that we shall not have to live long under conditions such as these."

According to the decree, all were to be deported except those who worked in German industries or for the Judenrat. Over the next nine days, 66,701 Jews were deported to Treblinka. At Treblinka, there was a sign outside the death camp that stated, "Do not worry about your future…All of you are headed for the east to work; while you work, your wives shall take care of your houses. But first you must bathe and your clothes must be cleaned of lice."

Only moments later, after merciless beatings by SS and Ukrainian guards, the Jews from the Warsaw Ghetto were herded into the crematoria.

On July 29, the second round of deportations from Warsaw began. A proclamation was posted by the Jewish police (most of whom were concerned foremost with saving themselves) urging Jews to volunteer for resettlement. The SS, along with Latvian and Lithuanian troops, closed off individual blocks and brutally forced the masses out for deportation. Shots rang out as many were shot on the spot; others were savagely beaten. When the crowd's numbers reached a few thousand, they were herded off to the Umschlagplatz – a deportation railway yard. Every morning and every evening the roundups took place.

During the month of August, 142,525 were deported, of whom 135,120 Jews were sent to Treblinka. By the middle of August, it was widely understood that "resettlement" was a myth. Enough evidence had already reached the ghetto by word of mouth from witnesses to the Nazi camps that resettlement actually meant death at Treblinka.

By Oct. 3, 310,00 Jews had been deported, including most members of the Judenrat. Many were deported on Sept. 21 – Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

On Tisha b'Av 1942, the well-organized Nazi killing machine was put into high gear. That day marked the beginning of the end of Warsaw Jewry. Of the 40,000 Jews who remained in the Warsaw Ghetto following the deportations, several hundred armed themselves and fought against their oppressors when they came to liquidate the ghetto in April 1943.

Soon other ghettos would face the same fate.

A chronicler of the Warsaw Ghetto, Emanuel Ringelblum, called the eve of that Tisha b'Av in 1942 "the blackest day in Jewish history in modern times. From that time, mass deportations and executions began."

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — An appeal for a period of calm and reflection in dealing with Switzerland, made by the Clinton administration's expert on Holocaust restitution issues, is going largely unheeded by the key players trying to resolve Holocaust-era claims.

In testimony before the Senate Banking Committee on July 15, Stuart Eizenstat reiterated a plea to U.S. public finance officers not to threaten Swiss banks with sanctions, saying that such steps would damage American financial markets, hurt U.S.-Swiss relations and further delay justice for Holocaust survivors.

"It is our feeling that we will get more by a non-confrontational approach at this point," said Eizenstat, the U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs.

"Swiss opinion has been so hardened by threats of sanctions and other allegations that flexibility to achieve a settlement will be further complicated" by punitive measures, he said.

Eizenstat called on the lawyers representing Swiss banks and Holocaust survivors to return to the negotiating table to try to reach a settlement to Holocaust-era claims. Talks broke down last month after the banks said $600 million was their best offer, and Jewish groups rejected the offer as "insulting" and in "bad faith."

The appeal for restraint appeared to carry little weight with the Jewish leaders and elected officials who appeared before the committee.

Michael Hausfeld, one of the lead attorneys representing Holocaust survivors in a class-action lawsuit against Swiss banks, rejected Eizenstat's appeal, saying of the administration official's repeated efforts to bring the two sides together: "He's had three periods of calm. Under American baseball rules he's out."

Israel Singer, general-secretary of the World Jewish Congress, struck a fiery tone when he told the committee: "We are ashamed of the lies that have been used to scuttle the talks. These talks didn't break down by mistake. They were broken down by an absence of good faith, by an absence of fair play, by an absence of attempting to deal with the question of moral restitution."

He said the banks made a settlement impossible "when they took the money and threw it on the table and told us, 'Take your money and go, all you people want is money and more money.'"

"The issue is not one of money, but moral restitution," Singer said, adding that the Jewish side is ready to return to the negotiating table.

Several states, including California, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Florida, have already taken punitive measures against Swiss banks, but New York state and New York City have set a deadline of Sept. 1 for implementing a gradual series of sanctions if a settlement is not reached by that date.

The wide-ranging hearing in mid-July was intended to re-examine a 1946 accord signed with Switzerland on the return of Nazi-looted gold. Switzerland agreed to return $58 million to the Allies in the 1946 Washington Accord despite records which showed that Switzerland had accepted several times that amount.

Sen. Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.), chair of the Senate committee, threatened to reopen that accord in light of the standstill in settlement talks. He said Switzerland must be brought back to the table and held accountable for its "deceitful conduct and apparent fraud."

No decision was made about reopening that agreement.

Switzerland did not send an official government representative to the hearing, saying that the government has already testified before Congress on several occasions and that the country had already taken sufficient steps to address its wartime past.

D'Amato said that Switzerland's absence at the hearing signalled that the country's history of stonewalling "is repeating itself."

Czar's burial fires anti-Semitism

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — The recent burial of Russia's last imperial family – intended to be a moment of national reconciliation – instead has fueled a national controversy that included some familiar anti-Jewish canards.

Shortly after the fate of the family became known some eight decades ago, a rumor spread that Jews were responsible for the death of the czar. Supporters of the conspiracy theory rely on the fact that many of the early Bolsheviks were of Jewish origin – including the head of the firing squad that shot the royal family.

The burial rekindled these theories once again.

"Regardless of the fuss made by the government and [Boris] Nemtsov, for Orthodox people the funeral will virtually not exist," Alexander Rakov, editor of a Russian Orthodox newspaper in St. Petersburg, said in an interview on the eve of the burial ceremony.

Rakov was referring to Nemtsov, the Russian deputy prime minister who headed a government commission that used historical and forensic arguments to dispel the version of the deaths that holds Jews responsible.

A placard at a hard-line monarchist and Christian rally, held two days before the remains were buried, read Satanic Regime – Satanic Rituals, a thinly veiled attack on an imagined Jewish plot against the czar and church.

In a recent interview, Sergei Khazanov-Pashkovsky, an activist with St. Petersburg's leading monarchist group, the Russian Imperial Union-Order, echoed the traditional cry of many Russian anti-Semites when he claimed that both the 1905 and 1917 Russian revolutions were financed with Jewish money.

With security tight,the burial passed without incident.

Israeli unemployment expected at 9.6 percent

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Unemployment will reach 9.4 to 9.6 percent this year – approximately 217,000 jobless – according to senior government economists discussing the macroeconomic backdrop to the 1999 state budget.

In preparatory talks between the Finance Ministry and the Bank of Israel, there has been widespread agreement that this year the jobless total will average nine percent – about 204,000. They say it will reach its 1998 high in December and will only begin to decline once economic growth passes the 2.5 percent mark.

The population and workforce are increasing at an annual 2.4 or 2.5 percent, and only when the gross domestic product increases at a faster pace will unemployment begin to subside, according to the Treasury.

The Treasury is forecasting economic growth at 1.5 percent this year, rising to 2.5 to three percent next year. Zilberfarb is already describing 1999 as a "transitional year," with growth only returning to its potential four to five percent by 2000.

When the Netanyahu government came into power just over two years ago, unemployment stood at 6.5 percent of the workforce. In 1990-91 the rate of unemployment peaked at 11 percent when the economy failed to provide immediate solutions for the newly arriving immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Analysts believe that the high rate of joblessness at that time played a crucial role in the Shamir government's electoral defeat in 1992.

Since then, many of the immigrants who were initially unemployed have adjusted their training credentials to local standards and landed jobs in their original or related professions.

Today most of the increase in unemployment is in low-tech industries and among people with less education. In 1997, unemployment rose to 10 percent among those with eight years schooling or less, but was slightly higher than four percent among those with at least 16 years schooling, according to government figures.

In addition to the textile and food industries, joblessness is also on the increase in tourism and construction. Tourism has not yet recovered from the wave of terrorist attacks that occurred just before the 1996 general election and construction is still suffering from the slowdown in immigration and the lack of economic growth.

Stroke changes dentist's view of life

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He thought he had it all – health, energy, financial and professional success, a close and loving family and boundless self-confidence.

That was 48-year-old Dr. Howard Rocket, a dentist-cum-entrepreneur, in October, 1995. In a minute everything changed.

On October 27 at 6:15 p.m., he collapsed, excrutiating pain coursing through his head.

Due to the injury, Rocket had suffered a massive basilar stroke, a blockage in the basilar artery, the main supplier of blood to the brainstem. Emergency surgery at the Western division of Toronto Hospital removed the blockage, but Rocket faced a long, difficult convalescence, and the realization that some of the effects were irreversable.

This realization was difficult for a man who, by his own admission, had always enjoyed being in control. But then, many things had changed for Rocket.

"My priorities are different now," he told The CJN in a recent interview. "I know what's important.

"I'm more spiritual now," he went on. "I seem to know naturally what's most important." He figures that if you compare daily stress with a stroke, maybe the stress isn't important enough to get sick over.

What is important to him now is not business success and the trappings that go with it. Family, friends, helping others have taken over.

He visits stroke victims frequently, and is always ready to take calls or speak about stroke to individuals or groups.

"It is important to give back time and effort to the community that helped save me," he said, explaining why he commissioned a book about his experiences called A Stroke of Luck (Parnassas Communication, 1998, written with Rachel Sklar). All the proceeds are going to the Rehabilitation Institute of Toronto (formerly the Queen Elizabeth Hospital) for stroke research, education and treatment.

Therapy

It was at that hospital that he received the months of therapy that resulted in his being nearly healed, except for a very weak left arm and leg, a far cry from the man who could not speak, see, breathe by himself, walk or feed himself.

He is now able to swim, drive a car, play tennis, and work as an entrepreneur. He uses a cane to help him walk, (in keeping in line with his new policy of making the best out of everything he began to collect antique canes and now has 30) but he insists that "it's to let other people know that I am not that [physically] stable." Much of his time is devoted to helping other stroke victims and their families.

A Stroke of Luck may seem like an odd title for the story Rocket is telling but that is how he looks at his experience. "I feel like a two-year-old in an adult's body," he said. "There is something new every day. You shouldn't take those things for granted."

Every morning, he said, he touches his tracheotomy scar, just to remind himself what might have happened.

Rocket is a great believer in the power of the will in healing. 'If you believe you can, you probably can," he said. Even if a person is confined to a wheelchair, he said for instance, "be the best wheelchair person you can be."

Rocket has achieved many of the goals he set himself, including walking down the aisle at his two daughters' weddings.

There is still something he wants to do. "I want to take my family to Israel on our 30th wedding anniversary. It will be in two years – and I want to be able to walk on and off the plane by myself."

A Stroke of Luck is available for $24.95 at Rehabilitation Institute of Toronto Foundation, 550 University Ave., Toronto, M5F 2A2, telephone 597-3040, and in bookstores.

Study finds genetic link to ovarian cancer

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A new study has found that women who develop breast cancer because of a particular genetic mutation are 10 times more likely to also develop ovarian cancer than are breast cancer victims without the DNA defect.

The genetic mutations that can lead to breast cancer are more frequently found among Jewish women of Ashkenazi descent than among the general population.

The benefit of the new information, according to an executive at the genetic testing laboratory that underwrote the study, is that women who know they have a hereditary link to breast cancer can be carefully screened for indications of ovarian cancer, which is particularly deadly and difficult to detect in its early stages.

An estimated 10 percent of breast cancer cases are believed to be linked to heredity. The causes of the other 90 percent are thought to be environmental, related to exposure to certain hormones, and linked to diet and exercise.

Among American women in general, very few – just two percent – develop breast cancer before age 50. But between one-third and one-half of all women with a genetic mutation – Jews and non-Jews – will develop the disease before they turn 50.

By age 70, about 12 percent of women without the mutation, and between 56 and 87 percent of women with the mutation, get breast cancer, recent studies have shown.

A small percentage of women with the genetic mutation that predisposes them to get breast cancer – 10 percent – are Jews of Ashkenazi descent, meaning their ancestors came from Central or Eastern Europe.

But since Jews account for about two percent of the American population, this disproportionate finding prompted alarm when the cancer-causing mutations on BRCA1 and BRCA2 were first identified about two years ago.

The purpose of the latest study was to find out which features of family history best predict mutations BRCA1 and BRCA2.

Determining the risk of ovarian cancer was not the study's primary purpose, but the link quickly became apparent from the data, according to Dr. Tom Frank, medical director for Myriad Genetic Laboratories.

Myriad spent some $570,000 to conduct the analysis involved in the study. Based in Salt Lake City, Utah, Myriad is the only firm that currently offers the test for breast cancer mutations commercially.

The link between genetic mutation and ovarian cancer was discovered by researchers from a dozen of the country's leading medical institutions – including the Sloan-Kettering Institute for Cancer Research in New York and the Anderson Cancer Centre in Houston – who worked cooperatively with Myriad on the project.

The study examined 238 women with breast or ovarian cancer, or both, whose family histories showed a strong likelihood of genetic mutation.

Researchers found that women who had breast cancer but no genetic mutation, developed ovarian cancer at the rate of under two in 1,000 women in the general population, which is about the same rate as that of women who have never had breast cancer, Frank said.

But with a genetic mutation, the incidence of ovarian cancer rose to over a one in 100 chance.

About 186,000 American women are diagnosed with breast cancer each year, and 44,000 women will die of the disease in the same period.

By contrast, some 26,000 women are diagnosed with ovarian cancer each year – and half that number, 13,000, will die of the disease each year.

Saul Korman celebrates 64th birthday by rebuilding

When I get older, losing my hair,
Many years from now,
Will you still be sending me a valentine,
Birthday greetings, bottle of wine?
Doing the garden, digging the weeds,
Who could ask for more?
Will you still need me,
Will you still feed me,
When I'm sixty-four?

Lennon and McCartney's idyllic blueprint for old age clearly doesn't apply to Saul Korman, who at age 64 is following another set of blueprints entirely. At a time when he could be forgiven for coasting into retirement, he's ripping up and rebuilding an already successful business. WHY?

"Ego," he allows. "Pure ego. I love my street, and I want to look my best for it."

Korman's love affair with the Danforth is well-documented by himself on many radio stations. If you've merely heard him extol its virtues, however, you might question whether his bravado is self-serving. But stroll along the

Love affair with the Danforth

Danforth with him, or join him for a coffee at any of the wonderful cafés and restaurants that line the street, and you'll understand that the man/street relationship runs far deeper than any advertising pitch could suggest.

Every twenty feet or so, Korman stops — or is stopped by — fellow merchants and passers-by. Warm greetings are exchanged. They love him; he loves them. Even the word "love", however, fails to convey the full depth of the rapport, for Korman doesn't merely love the Danforth, he lives it: eats, sleeps and breathes it.

"It's all here," he crows. "Forty years ago it wasn't; now it is. We have two synagogues. World-class restaurants. Shopping. Travel agencies! If you're going to Greece, go with a Greek travel agent. They know Greece! Food? The best specialty food shop in the city is right here on my block! Ladies' fashion? Right next door to me — world class! But character — that's what the Danforth is all about. Malls spend a fortune trying to create ambience, but money can't buy what we already have. Our atmosphere is indigenous; it comes with the territory. We have Mediterranean flavour because we have Mediterraneans! We'll have half a million people for the Taste [Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth, Aug. 7 to 9]. We have tachles. We have LIFE," he roars.

Say l'echaim, Danforth style!

Though coy about the completion date for renovations, Korman promises an exquisite new facade

On a quieter note, Korman's eyes mist over as exclaims, "I'm extremely proud of my children" [Michael, Shawn and Jodi]. Korman plans to hand over the reigns of the business to Michael if and when he does the unthinkable and retires. Meanwhile it's full steam ahead.

"You have to keep moving if you want to stay on the cutting edge," he states. "I decided it was time to take a big step forward." Amid the rattle and bang of hammers and the scream of power saws, you'll find some of the most spectacular values ever at Korry's, as many of his customers have already discovered. If you don't mind stepping over a power cord or two, there's never been a better time to visit 569 Danforth.

So whether you're "getting older, losing your hair" or you're there already, visit the Danforth August 7 to 9 and enjoy North America's pre-eminent street festival. And while you're there, pay a visit to Korry's. A certain shy but not yet retiring gentleman would like to say hello.

Palace offers regal dining experience

What's in a name? In the case of The Palace, everything. On the main floor, a warm, cozily stuccoed room girded by massive pine beams fairly glows with the promise of a superb feast. On the second level above, the same wonderful ambience is bathed in natural light from all directions — sprawling skylights above, and huge windows wrapping the room on two full sides. The entire place, in fact, looks like a picture from a children's fairy-tale book. It's a fitting scenario, since partners Peter Hadjis and Napoleon Zacharakis have devoted their 50-plus years in the restaurant business to making customers' culinary dreams come true.

Fresh fish and seafood are a specialty, and here you'll find the largest selection on the Danforth. Filet of sole, red snapper, salmon steak, rainbow trout, sea bass — you name it, The Palace has it, all grilled or broiled to perfection. Seasonal offerings include fresh halibut, swordfish and grouper, and kalamari is available both as an entrée and as an appetizer.

The oven-baked stuffed lamb and mousaka are simply superb. The Palace even offers a selection of special entrées that must be ordered in advance, including many unusual dishes you won't find anywhere else.

During the Krinos Foods Taste of the Danforth Aug. 7 to 9, the Palace will offer three superb specials: Stuffed Lamb, $14.95; Chicken Kebab, $10.95; and Mousaka, $11.95.

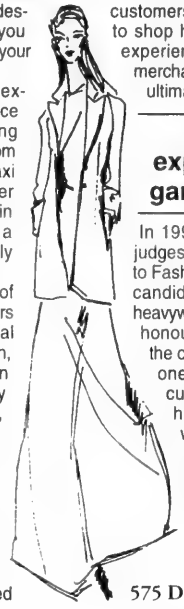
From humble beginnings some 30 years ago on Bloor Street, Maxi Boutique migrated to its current location at 575 Danforth Avenue, where it has emerged as one of Canada's leading ladies' retail fashion destinations. The word is out: if you want style with service, this is your stop.

In 1995, Maxi underwent extensive renovations to produce the glamorous yet welcoming premises of today. Women from all over Toronto seek out Maxi not only for leading designer labels but also for expertise in fitting and coordinating, and a willingness to enthusiastically address their every need.

Always a strong promoter of Canadian designers, Maxi offers the very latest from Crystal Siemens, Misura, David Dixon, and Lida Baday. An American contingent includes Betsy Johnson, Mark Eisen, Laundry, and Urchin; the European market is represented by labels such as Teenflo and Tombolini. Each piece is hand-picked, often with a particular customer in mind.

Sisters Sandy and Elizabeth Bartzis have continued the fashion legacy established by their parents (and Maxi's founders), James and Hristina Bartzis. The sisters are best known for their warm, knowledgeable approach. Says Sandy, "You wouldn't believe how many of our customers tell us what a pleasure it is to shop here. When they value the experience even more than the merchandise, they're paying you the ultimate compliment."



Meeting high expectations helps garner major award

In 1998 a distinguished panel of judges voted Maxi Boutique Toronto Fashion Retailer of the Year, over candidates that included every heavyweight in the industry. Though honoured, the Bartzis sisters say the critics who count most are the ones they serve daily: their customers. "Our clients have high expectations, and so do we," she smiles. "We wouldn't have it any other way."

Avec Plaisir a perfect fit on Danforth

Delectably ensconsed between Korry's and Maxi Boutique on the Danforth's "Fashion Row", Avec Plaisir brings new meaning to the phrase "quality and service". Building on a decade of success in Toronto's toney Yorkville district, husband-wife team Peter and Vasilia Panagakos searched extensively for a second location before selecting 573 Danforth Avenue. "We felt that the Danforth, with its European ambience, offered the most appealing setting for our customers," says Peter. By offering the "crème de la crème" of lingerie, swimwear and hosiery lines and the expert fitting and service that department stores don't, Avec Plaisir has seen its customer base grow relentlessly.

A large part of their business, says Vasilia, comes from women who receive imperfect fittings elsewhere. "There's no margin for error in a bra fitting," she states. "It has to fit perfectly." If yours don't, you're in good company: according to Vasilia, fully 70% of her first-time customers are wearing the wrong size, usually because they've purchased at a store that lacks either the full size range or the fitting expertise or both. Avec Plaisir, on the other hand, carries sizes 32A to 42E and thoroughly trains its staff in the nuances of bra fitting.

The merchandise is exquisitely European, the result of regular buying trips to Paris and Milan. From Switzerland, you'll find the most divine pure mercerized cotton panties that feel like heaven and last simply forever.

In recent years, Avec Plaisir has experienced a spectacular increase in its sales of bridal lingerie. From bodysuits and bustiers to corsets and leg garters, they have everything the bride needs to make her honeymoon truly special.

Customers share Sun Valley's obsession with quality

Think you're good at spotting imperfections in fruit and vegetables? Think again. At Sun Valley Fine Foods, you may need a magnifying glass.

Upholding a family tradition begun by his father, Spiro Aravantinos and partner Peter Vacirtzoglou have elevated fine food purveyance to an art form. Rising at the crack of dawn to hand-pick the cream of the fruit and vegetable crop, the partners then race across town to 583 Danforth Avenue and stack it in row on bountiful row so gleaming and seamless you almost feel guilty picking it up. The produce at this emporium of fine food comes as close to perfection as you'll ever find. Fresh herbs are flown in weekly from Israel.

Sun Valley brims with culinary delights in every nook and cranny. You'll find breads from Ace Bakery and Stonemill, among others; a dozen flavours of pita from Pita Break; gourmet crackers galore; and the finest jams money can buy, including Greaves from Niagara-On-The-Lake. In fact, Sun Valley's "designer collection" of fine spreadables, sauces and dressings includes a host of famous labels. From the U.K., there's Cross & Blackwell, Gordon's, Patak's, and Sharwood's; from France, Maille and St-Dalfour; from the U.S., Paula's, Jacques Pépin's, and Olde Cape Cod; and others too numerous to mention from around the world. Sun Valley also offers its own house brand of jams, sauces and dressings bottled for it by an award-winning Canadian supplier. There's a small selection of Kosher products, which the partners plan to expand in the near future.

Exclusive to Sun Valley is a cold-pressed, extra-virgin olive oil from Greece that was ranked #1 among all oils tested in a recent Toronto Star poll, and described as follows: "Organic Extra Native Oil (Greece). Good solid colour. Creamy and a little earthy. Rich to the nose. Well-balanced and integrated. Good firm texture. Herbaceous aromatics." — Toronto Star, June 24/98

Responding to changing demographics in the Danforth area, Sun Valley underwent major renovations in 1993. The glittering result — immaculate inside and out — has succeeded in catering to a growing yuppie class with international tastes while retaining its loyal Greek following.

One extremely pleasant surprise at Sun Valley is price. You'd expect to pay a premium for the exquisite quality they offer, but you don't. As of this writing, for example, ultra-crisp, whistle-clean romaine lettuce was going for 79¢ a head. "Value is part of our tradition," says Spiro. "We cannot and will not overcharge."

At the centre of the store is a pentagonal meat and deli counter featuring cheese from around the world (including some eight varieties of feta), prime quality meat and poultry, and the plumpest, juiciest olives this side of heaven. Sun Valley's hand-cut shish kebabs are in such demand that a full-time butcher was added to the in-house staff for the sole purpose of cutting shish kebabs. Distinctively superior to the cookie-cutter variety you'll find in many supermarkets, they are typical of Sun Valley's obsession with quality, and, as an in-store sign proudly proclaims, contain NO MSG. WE NEVER USE IT AND WE NEVER WILL.

If you're a nosher, an embarrassment of riches awaits you. Cakes and pastries from Dufflet, La Rocca and Pauline's are supplemented by Sun Valley's own cookies, croissants and banana breads baked fresh daily in store. Confections include Valrhona chocolates from France. Coffee from A.L. Van Houtte, considered by many connoisseurs to be the finest available today, is offered in some 15 delicious blends.

Spiro and Peter thrive on the long hours that are part and parcel of the food business. "It's a labour of love," says Spiro — and one that's rewarded daily. "When customers take our food home, in a sense they're taking us home," he smiles.

Mezes rooted in family values

As you approach Mezes, the first thing you notice is its spectacular wrought-iron patio with tall pedestals adorned with flowers and vines. Inside, a courtyard effect: bubbling fountain, elegantly pillowed wrought-iron benches and Greek pottery echo a faraway world that is still vividly etched in owner Sue Zindros' memory. "Growing up, we would sit around the table and share both the day's events and the variety of dishes my mother had lovingly prepared. Sometimes it was just feta cheese, olives and watermelon, but it didn't matter. Forks would fly across the table, but somehow everyone ended up consuming equal amounts. To me that was ideal, because my mother never really knew if I ate all my vegetables." It is through Mezes, Sue says, that she and her sister Christine (the head chef) are able to share these treasured memories with guests.

Both Sue and Christine are on the same culinary wavelength — namely, that all dishes be prepared fresh daily to ensure consistently high quality. The most important factor in flavour, Sue says, is using the highest-quality cold-pressed extra-virgin olive oil. The Greek product in particular, she claims, has been shown to promote increased health and longevity. It also has a symbolic value that has prompted Zindros to acquire her own personal olive grove in Greece, with a view to perhaps pressing her own oil some day.

The fruits of Mezes' teamwork are joyously abundant and evident on your first bite. Lamb chops are a house favourite, as are the superbly seasoned fresh whole red snapper or sea bass. Vegetarian dishes are a Mezes forté; highly recommended are the grilled vegetable plate and the vegetarian moussaka. Among the appetizers (mezes) for which the restaurant is named, the feta cheese saganaki (pan fried and flambéed in ouzo) is unsurpassed. And their kleftiko is melt-in-your-mouth delicious: succulent chucks of chicken or lamb, topped with spinach and feta cheese, wrapped in filo pastry. The tastes will have you closing your eyes in bliss and comparing them with favourites from your own past.

AUTHENTIC GREEK CUISINE

456 DANFORTH AVENUE
(416) 778-5150

Mezes is open late, seven days a week; supper is served until midnight Sunday to Thursday, until 3 a.m. Friday and Saturday. Reservations are recommended. Mezes is also happy to cater your office parties and other functions.

Mezes is a business, to be sure; but by treating it first and foremost as a vehicle for sharing their cherished experiences, the two sisters have succeeded in going forward by looking back. Whatever your perspective, you'll taste the difference that caring and quality make.

Ouzeri thrives on fresh approach

After purchasing the popular eatery in November '97, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis (whose father Jim was executive chef and partner at Burlington's famed Lord Nelson Restaurant) revamped the menu with a view to offering fewer dishes but making every dish count. "We prefer to offer fifty superb selections than a hundred good ones," says Alex. "And freshness is paramount; from field to table is our modus operandi."

In addition to a wide variety of Greek appetizers, you'll find a few intriguing entrées available nowhere else on the Danforth. Signature dishes include the wonderfully garnished and baked Oysters Ouzeri; Chicken Parmesan; and Breaded Chicken with Wine Mushroom or Lemon Butter Sauce.

Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Salmon, Pickerel, Rainbow Trout, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Accompany these delectables with a fine wine from Ouzeri's extensive international list and you have all the ingredients of a culinary bonanza.

Ouzeri is a cheery, festive place, especially on Tuesday nights when live Greek music plays to the wee hours. Its patio ranks among the Danforth's' largest and liveliest, and the sightlines both within and without are clean. If you're a people-watcher, Ouzeri is unparalleled — not only on the Danforth, but city-wide.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. The dining environment is immaculate, the cuisine impeccable. If you haven't visited Ouzeri recently, perhaps now is the time.

South Side Christina's gets top billing

A quick Danforth quiz: Which restaurant has the most spectacular patio; the best plate of lamb chops; the most elegant decor; the latest hours (open till 4 a.m.); the largest celebrity crowd; and the most intriguing owners? If you answered "South Side Christina's" to all of the above, you're obviously a regular; if you didn't, maybe it's time to check out one of Toronto's most compelling dining spots.

Despite the spellbinding decor that has earned it bragging rights as a leading film shoot site, South Side Christina's boasts a menu that is chock-full of some of Toronto's finest food values. After you've been greeted by John or Dean Kekkas, both of whom have secret lives that would fill up a novel in their own right — or their extremely gracious uncle Steve — it's time to hunker down to a delicious and highly affordable feast.

SOUTH SIDE CHRISTINA'S

Try the Roast Rack of Lamb in a mustard cream sauce; at only $17.95, it's a culinary "Brinks Job". Another steal is the Chicken stuffed with Mushrooms ($12.25). For steak lovers, The Black Angus with Roasted Garlic in a red wine reduction ($14.95) is worth its weight in gold. All entrées, including the above, are served with rice, roast potatoes and seasonal vegetables.

On Friday and Saturday nights, belly dancing afficionados will enjoy the city's finest performers. Live music is featured on Friday through Sunday nights. South Side Christina's swells with song; a variety of live international music breezes through the dining room and out onto the large open patio. It feels like freedom, and you'll love every minute of it.

Any Sucker would fall for this store

If you're old enough to forget what being a kid in a candy store is like, Suckers will take you back to the most riotous excesses of your childhood and amplify them tenfold.

The brainchild of ....It Store founder Jack Green, Suckers has erupted on the Danforth in a bucket-hurling splash of colour, animated by an ever-changing montage of vintage cartoons and commercials. The "production" is scored with individually-pressed CDs. Suckers is crammed with literally hundreds of sweets you won't find at any corner store, and offers a vast collection of nostalgic toys. Outrageous? Yes. So much so that three generations of present-day and wannabe-again kids have embraced it with an abandon that has surprised even its creator, a driven bachelor who by his own admission understands children "because I'm still a child myself."

"Candy tests we conducted at the ....It Store convinced me that people were looking for something more than over-the-counter confections," he says. "Over years of travel and research I developed a vision that embodied all my candy-coated whims, but I had no guarantee that others would share it."

Share it they have — in droves. Daytime carriage trade; evening after-dinner crowd; late-hour yuppie crowd: all have converged on Suckers in staggering numbers since its opening. Greeting them are innovations galore. The M&M Colour Program (exclusive to Suckers) offers the tumbling taste temptations in 21 different colours. Soon to feature a "Willy Wonka" party room for kids' parties, the flagship Suckers store has been so successful that three more stores are opening this summer, with14 other locations currently under negotiation.

What has proven most gratifying, says Green, is the fact that people of all ages derive pleasure from their visit. Bubies and Zaidies rub elbows with their grandchildren at elaborate gum machines that would make any pinball wizard proud. This magic carpet ride provides a sensory experience that "is instantly uplifting; it's a dose of happiness."

The real key, says Green, is that "We don't dispense candy; we revere it. We don't feed; we entertain." The only problem experienced at Suckers to date, he laments, is that "once the kids are inside, they can't control their parents."

Astoria's souvlaki judged best in major media polls

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 21 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. And what souvlaki! Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life (1998) and "Best of Toronto" by Now Magazine (1997), Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled sea bass and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like kalamari and saganaki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, richly appointed interior.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

CIBC makes difference in community

As Community Manager for the Danforth, Dave D'Amico has a twofold responsibility: one, to ensure a high quality of service within his member branches; and two, to promote goodwill and improve the quality of life in the surrounding community.

Dave D'Amico
CIBC Danforth Community Manager
421-0051

Not unique to the Danforth, this approach is part of a company-wide commitment to providing help where help is needed. Underscoring this fact, in '97/98 the CIBC donated some $19 million to a wide variety of charities and causes, including the Baycrest Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Riverdale Hospital, Toronto East General Hospital, several schools, and countless community projects.

D'Amico favours a hands-on approach that sees him personally participating in fund-raising and other charitable events. He also takes pleasure in encouraging employees, associates and friends to do likewise.

D'Amico brings to the table an extensive background in both banking and volunteer work. And as someone who has lived and worked on the Danforth for a number of years, he is well-positioned to turn CIBC's strong presence in the area (10 branches) to good account.

Building goodwill starts within each branch, he says. "We want every single visit to be a happy one for our customers. This is a standard we strive to uphold each and every day." Good works outside the branch are a natural extension of this philosophy, he says. "We want people to think of the CIBC not only as a great place to bank, but as a good neighbour."

D'Amico's approachability, easygoing manner and work ethic have endeared him to Danforth business people and members of the general community, and he relishes the opportunity to serve. The sense that he is helping to make a difference gives him "all the gratification I need. Giving back to the community isn't something that's nice to do, it's something we have to do."

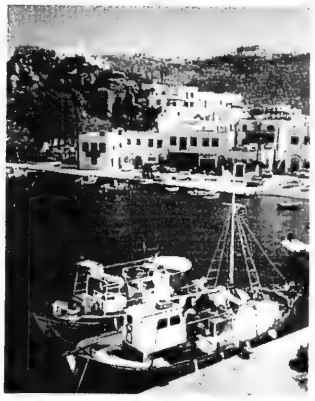
Skyway the only way to Greece!

In their 38 years of business, partners Aris Sideratos and George Sevdalis have booked enough direct flights to sunny Greece to circle the globe a few times "with a refuelling stop on Venus," kids Sideratos.

The destination may be celestial, but the service at this bustling travel agency is very down-to-earth. As Canada's largest independent Greek tour operator, Skyway is a leader in both individual and corporate travel. Its large clientele (including a certain well-known Danforth haberdasher!) relies on Skyway's ability to book flights at a moment's notice and its total commitment to service.



Skyway has a particularly strong relationship with Regent Holidays, and offers highly competitive pricing on Regent's full range of tours to Greece. Direct non-stop flights on the day and at the time of your choice are a phone call away, and Skyway will go the distance to ensure that the seating and meal arrangements are to your liking. Skyway deals with all major air carriers and will get you where you want to go with a minimum of fuss. "We pull our hair out so our clients don't have to," jokes George.

Skyway offers its customers the best of the old and new: old-fashioned personal service from owners who are almost always in the store, and fully automated flight tracking that determines seat availability instantly.

So when it's time to arrange your vacation, picture your favourite Greek island destination; when you can almost feel the Mediterranean breeze on your cheeks, pick up the phone and call Aris or George. They'll have you there before you can say "Opa!"

Avli courts discerning clientele

From the street, Avli is easy to spot, with its blue and gold sign and smiling sunflowers. When you step inside, you'll immediately notice the refreshing coolness. Here's a place to relax over a fine dinner and wine on a summer evening.

The whitewashed walls with their dried flowers and vines suggest a village in the Greek Islands or Asia Minor. The earthenware vessels which grace the room, with their warm colours, are based on classic Cypriot designs which unite simplicity and beauty.

Owner/chef Lambro Vassiliou is constantly expanding the already-impressive wine list. He especially recommends the Gerovassiliou, a white blend of Greek grapes which has won Gold Medals in Canada and Europe, and is now so popular it's hard to keep in stock.

Lambro takes pride in cuisine which is hearty, healthful, and light, blending flavours from Greece and the Middle East. Avli is renowned for its Lamb Shank, and Rabbit and Chicken Pies prepared in special clay dishes. Order these dishes early; main courses are not pre-cooked, but prepared individually for you.

Avli also offers a fine selection of fresh fish. Fresh Atlantic Salmon is always on the menu, along with two or three other varieties, which may include Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Swordfish, Kingfish or Mahimahi. Vegetarian dishes and a variety of excellent dips such as Taramosalata, Meltzanosalata and Kopanisti round out the menu. Desserts are opulent and delicious.

Ever the innovator, Lambro has added venison, caribou and other wild game to the menu. These are served mainly as grilled steaks with fine sauces and chutneys.

Many touches add to Avli's appeal. Some evenings, for example, there's a pianist with a range of music from Greek to classical. This is not a loud and boisterous place, but a destination for quiet conversation and the company of family and friends, to be enjoyed over cuisine that is distinctively different from the mainstream.

Benmurgui a man of many talents

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You might not have expected Ralph Benmergui to be the guy playing background percussion in the recent Toronto Fringe Festival production Higher Ground.

But he was. Actor, comic, broadcaster, the host of CBC Newsworld's Benmergui Live was a back-up musician for his friend, film and television actor, Chas Lawther, who, with actor/writer/director Ditch Dickinson, wrote the show.

The drummer originally scheduled to play was unable to do the show. "I'm the sub," Benmergui says.

What he liked about participating in the Fringe Festival, he says, "was that there were four mature men [including musician Stuart Clow] standing on stage being sincere."

It is appropriate that he was in Higher Ground, a mixture of music and monologue that starts as a parody about evangelical entertainment but soon emerges as a weave of parables about moments when we awake to what it means to be human.

Lawther's script addresses coming to terms with death and mortality, issues in Ralph Benmergui's personal life that seem to have brought him a new understanding of what is valuable.

Almost 43 and recovering from an operation on a vertebral disc, Benmergui says he is grateful for life's fundamentals, "for my children, my wife, who is kind enough to have stayed married to me… grateful that my mother is still alive, and my siblings. Grateful I'm working and that there are those who like what I do."

Born in Tangiers, Morocco, to a Spanish speaking, Sephardi family, Benmergui immigrated with his parents to Toronto when he was two. Proud and fond of the North African community in which he was raised, he grew up in a midtown Jewish neighborhood, where he felt foreign because his mother tongue and cultural practices were different.

Benmergui, his wife Kathryn and their two sons, Joshua and Chas, belong to an egalitarian Ashkenazi synagogue. "I'm not comfortable in a community which exalts one gender spiritually and leaves the other to make the home their place of worship," he says.

Kosher and vegetarian himself, he says he perceives religion as, "a codified series of concepts that will give you a disciplined path to your own spirituality."

He says he suspects that people who avoid religion really don't want to deal with the demands of spirituality, yet he advocates following the middle road and giving regard to the material world we inhabit. Though he strongly identifies with Judaism, he has studied other religions and finds "comfort and wisdom" in Buddhism.

His career has not been linear either. Devoted to music (he includes genres as diverse as Sufi devotional music, jazz and early rock and roll in his personal collection), he was the lead singer for the group The Stingers. He has studied acting at the University of Alberta, worked in film and television, been a stand-up comic, and studied journalism at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

His association with the CBC began with a research job in Winnipeg. Over the past 13 years, he has been a late-night radio host and a host on CBC Television's Midday before becoming a national performer with his own television program.

Today, he says, the things that drive him are different. "When I was younger my dream was to be King Kong in some way, to project out and far enough and often enough to let you know I was here. Now, I don't care about that. I just want to have fun and enjoy my life and work on things like not yelling at the kids. That's tough enough."

He says he is excited about the new weekend show Not Just The News, which he will host on CBC Newsworld this fall, because it uses satire to analyse current events. Satire, he says, "allows people to wake up, because it grabs you by the nose and twists it and you go, 'ow.' It gets you away from the way you often see things or the way authority would like you to see things."

But don't ask Benmergui about his plans for the future. He is content with savoring the present and wants to avoid tempting fate. "I'm not foolish enough to think I can control what I'm going to be doing in the next five years," he says.

Consultant helps businesses prepare for trade shows

A good-looking booth is not enough

BY JAMES PASTERNAK
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many companies rely on trade shows to help increase their sales. With shows becoming more sophisticated however, these companies must work harder than ever to get their message heard.

Barry Siskind, president of International Training and Management Company, headquartered in Terra Cotta, Ont., has been a trade show consultant for 17 years.

Siskind says most companies make three mistakes when planning to enter a trade show: they do not take the pre-show planning process seriously; they enter into a show without a clear set of objectives; and there is little follow-up on leads captured during the show.

He says that many companies do not know what to take to the show, they do not know how to put the booth together properly, and they do not budget wisely.

In 1997, Siskind conducted 180 workshops, about 50 percent of them in Canada, and the rest in Asia, South America, India, Mexico, Europe and the United States.

Barry Siskind

His book, The Power of Exhibit Marketing, is now in its 4th edition and he has written over 200 articles on trade show marketing. He also writes an annual supplement for The Globe and Mail.

About 3,000 companies attend his open workshop, which he gives 15 to 18 times a year. As well, he works directly with companies such as banks, insurance companies, pharmaceuticals and manufacturers to help them prepare for trade shows.

"I used to [take part] in 10 to 12 shows per year and I watched people who had booths much bigger than [mine]. I realized very quickly that having a good-looking booth was not enough."

The key is "talking with a prospect and finding out what they want. This is a three-minute process," he says.

Siskind says that companies have less than three seconds to grab someone's attention, so the right booth setup is crucial.

Siskind also trains staff how to work at the booth. "It goes beyond not chewing gum and not sitting down," he says.

He says that one of the most important benefits of the trade show is that it provides one-stop shopping, and therefore shortens the sales cycle.

"The Centre for Exhibition Industry Research reports that exhibitors who understand the unique selling environment of the show and develop skills to achieve their objectives are the most successful," Siskind says.

In the past 10 years, says Siskind, trade shows have changed tremendously. There are more shows to choose from and people go to fewer of them. The cost of shows is also increasing tremendously.

Siskind tells companies that shows "should not be taken lightly. They are coming into the forefront and are becoming serious, sophisticated and professional."

He predicts that Toronto, with several exhibit halls, is on the verge of a trade show boom.

"We are going to attract world-class shows to Canada. "We're learning very quickly. Our shows are coming up to world standards very fast."

Film looks at Hungarian family

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Toronto-based Alliance Communications Corp. is producing a movie in which Ralph Fiennes plays the parts of three Jews in a multi-generational saga.

The triple role in The Taste of Sunshine, currently filming in Budapest, represents a major switch for the British actor, who brought the sadistic Nazi concentration camp commander Amon Goeth to life in Schindler's List.

Fiennes won an Academy Award nomination for that performance and a second one for his role in The English Patient.

The new film centres on the Sonnenschein family, which rises from humble beginnings to positions of wealth and power in the crumbling Austro- Hungarian Empire. Fiennes plays three of the Sonnenscheins.

Also starring are Jennifer Ehle, Rachel Weisz, Molly Parker, William Hurt, Rosemary Harris, Miriam Margolyes and James Frain. Istvan Szabo, who directed Mephisto is directing. Mephisto was voted best foreign film in 1981. Szabo co-wrote the screenplay with American playwright Israel Horovitz.

Shooting will continue through the summer and fall in Budapest, Vienna and Berlin. No release date has been set.

SPIELBERG ISSUES WARNING ON 'PVT. RYAN'

Steven Spielberg, one of the most commercially successful filmmakers in American cinematic history, has gone on his first road tour to promote a film since 1982.

The film, Saving Private Ryan, stars Tom Hanks, Edward Burns and Matt Damon. It focuses on the D-Day invasion of Normandy and a difficult military mission in which a group of soldiers attempt to retrieve an American private whose brothers have been killed in combat.

Steven Spielberg

The opening scenes of Saving Private Ryan depict the war in a far more grisly and violent way than American cinematographers have usually done in the past.

"The reason I'm going across the country on this one is to warn parents and young people that this film may not be their cup of tea," Spielberg recently explained to the Los Angeles Times. "I have a real responsibility to do that, especially because of the first 24 minutes of this film."

Spielberg said he felt it was important to show the war in a graphically realistic way without hiding any of the violence.

"You know, in this age of disclosure, it would have been irresponsible for me to undercut the truth of what that war was like," he said. "There have been 84 World War II films that showed something else. This would have been the 85th slap in the face to the men who died knowing the truth."

Composer Honored: Ben Steinberg, composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai has been awarded the degree of doctor of humane letters (honoris causa) by Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion, New York.

The seminary of the Reform Movement honored Steinberg for his research on Jewish music and for his own compositions and body of work. He is one of "the truly creative spirits of the American synagogue," the seminary said in conferring the degree.

* * *

Cantorial Correction: Ted Labow, who sings in Summer Opera Lyric Theatre's upcoming production of La Traviata, is a "cantorial soloist" and not a "cantor," as he was described in a recent column.

"At some very near date, I will probably pursue a certification from the powers that be to be eligible for the title 'cantor,'" he explains. "Until then, in order to keep peace with my colleagues who slugged it out for several years in graduate school, I must content myself with the soloist handle."

* * *

In the Spotlight: For more than half a century Irving Howe was a commanding, if controversial, figure in American intellectual life.

Born in 1920, Howe grew up in the East Bronx of New York, became a Trotskyist socialist as a teenager, and served in the U.S. army during World War II. From 1946 on, he became a regular contributor of literary articles for important journals like Partisan Review and Commentary.

In the early 1950s, he published the well-known Treasury of Yiddish Stories and founded the socialist magazine Dissent, which he edited for nearly 40 years. During the 1960s and early 1970s he took part in major intellectual debates over such hot topics as the Vietnam War, the New Left radical movement, the racial question, feminism, and Israel; he also became a sharp critic of such writers as Ralph Ellison and Philip Roth.

In 1976, Howe published World Of Our Fathers, a history of immigrant Jewish culture that won the National Book Award.

Howe, who died in recent years, is remembered in a new biography, Irving Howe: Socialist, Critic, Jew, by author Edward Alexander, a professor of English at the University of Washington. The story of Irving Howe's intellectual growth "is a chronicle of lost causes, as he himself would have been the first to admit," Alexander asserts. Socialism failed as a political force in America and was irreparably besmirched by the Soviet regime; and Howe's brand of secular Jewishness was overtaken by Zionism, religion, and assimilation.

Alexander corresponded and debated with Howe for 20 years. "I always felt that I was learning something by listening to Howe's voice, a kind of life-wisdom that went beyond political differences," Alexander said.

Irving Howe: Socialist, Critic, Jew is published by Indiana University Press.

Budapest Jewish community is still thriving

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

BUDAPEST — On a recent trip to Budapest, I discovered District VII or Erzébetváros, the traditional Jewish quarter of the city.

It was established in the 18th century when Jews were still forbidden to live within the city walls, and became a ghetto in 1944-45 under Nazi occupation.

Although 700,000 Hungarian Jews were murdered in the Holocaust, the Jewish community in Budapest, estimated at 80,000 people, still thrives today.

Like many of the other buildings in this city that date from the latter half of the century, the Central Synagogue (1859), on Dohány utca is grandiose. It is the largest synagogue in Europe, second largest in the world, with a capacity of 3,000. (New York's Temple Emmanuel is the largest.) The building is so enormous that it cannot be heated and has never been used in winter.

The Central Synagogue's facade has been restored and the brickwork glows red, blue and yellow. Gold leaves glimmer on Moorish domes, their orientalism a reaction against Austrian rule.

Once I passed through the metal detectors, I was overcome by the beauty of the synagogue's interior. On the ceiling, Stars of David are outlined in gold leaf, and intertwined on the floor are eight-pointed stars.

A 10-year, $10-million (US) facelift was financed by the Hungarian government and Tony Curtis' Emmanuel Foundation.

Next door is the National Jewish Museum. Here one can find beautifully crafted Judaic objects but there are no signs explaining when or where they were made. A small Judaic bookshop is located at the entrance of the museum and there is a small Holocaust exhibit in a separate room.

Upstairs from the main exhibit room is a small collection of Jewish art from past and present artists. The museum is housed on the site of Theodor Herzl's birthplace.

From the museum, I walked around the corner to the small Heroes' Temple (1931), a memorial to Hungarian Jews who died in World War I. This shul, located behind the Central Synagogue in the Garden of Remembrance courtyard, is one of several synagogues still active today. In the courtyard is a memorial to those who died in the Holocaust. A silver sculpture by artist Imre Varga, erected in 1990, depicts a silver weeping willow tree with each leaf inscribed with the name of someone who died in the Holocaust.

Varga also created a statue of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved more than 20,000 Budapest Jews. It stands in Buda in District 2, on Szilágyi Erzsébet, because Communist authorities insisted it be placed far from the city centre.

The Orthodox synagogue on the corner of Kazinczy and Dob utca is in desperate need of restoration. Many of the windows are broken and there was KGB spray painted in yellow on the front doors of the shul. This synagogue, while still in use, is closed to the public.

The Budapest Jewish community has seen some revitalization in the past 10 years. Eastern Europe's only rabbinical centre is at VIII József körút 27 and there are also four Jewish day schools here.

From the Orthodox synagogue on Kazinczy, I walked along Dob utca until I came across Frohlich Cukrászda, a kosher pastry shop, at number 22, where I bought apple strudel for 40 cents (US).

The oldest synagogue in Budapest, dating back to medieval times, used to be in the Castle District at I Táncsis utca 26.

When I visited this shul, I was disappointed to find the only Jewish remnant was the mezuzah on the door. Now a museum, there was nothing inside suggesting it had ever been a synagogue.

The dome of the Central Synagogue in Budapest [top] and the interior [left]. The shul was completed in 1859. [Viva Press photos]

Artists & Creativity

What inspires creativity in the artist? Is creativity in the artist the inevitable expression of an accumulation of experiences? Or does creativity flow from a single, watershed experience? In this, the first in a series of sketches on Artists and Creativity that will explore such questions, Bill Gladstone has interviewed two renowned and experienced worldly visual artists.

Next week, an interview with poet Robyn Sarah.

By BILL GLADSTONE

It was the 1936 movie Rembrandt starring Charles Laughton that persuaded then-14-year-old student Aba Bayefsky to switch from an academic stream to the art department at Toronto's Central Tech High School, but it was his experience as an official war artist in Europe during and immediately after World War II that instilled a deep and permanent sense in him of what he should be doing as an artist.

Accepted into the Royal Canadian Air Force, Bayefsky was on assignment at the 39th Reconnaissance Wing in Germany, situated next to Belsen concentration camp. It was the end of the war and Belsen had just been liberated. Bayefsky arrived there with his sketchbooks and witnessed first-hand some of the horrors that had befallen the Jewish people.

"I saw pits with thousands of dead bodies piled in them. They were just lumps, that's all. They had trucks backing up to these pits and they were just throwing them in. It had a profound impact on me. My impressions of Belsen have never gone away. They're with me today and I see them even more clearly as I grow older. It was a major experience of my life."

Bayefsky has been painting for at least 60 of his 75 years. Some of his Belsen canvases are on display at the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, and his work is found in the Art Gallery of Ontario, Hart House, corporate halls and private homes. He has been exhibited in New York, Chicago, London, Tokyo and India.

His studio on King Street West in Toronto is filled with canvases and natural light. Having just returned from a visit to Israel, he has been producing a series of small pieces showing scenes from the Holy Land – the gates and greenery of Jerusalem, the mountains and plains of the Judean desert. The animated shapes and vibrant colors that mark his work are evident. So is the shining passion for life that jumps from the canvas.

"I'm concerned about making a statement with my work, about what I say as an artist. In the work that I did at Belsen and the post-Belsen work, I want to be clear in what I'm saying. How can I paint things other than those things that have some association with reality for me? I won't be critical about what other artists do, but art that doesn't say anything is just meaningless to me."

In seeking subject matter for his work, Bayefsky returns often to biblical and talmudic themes. He published a portfolio of paintings called Tales From The Talmud; the Canadian government gave a copy of the portfolio to the late Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin when he visited Canada.

Bayefsky has also made thousands of sketches and paintings of Kensington Market, the colorful downtown neighborhood that was once predominantly Jewish.

Bayefsky's compositions are also shaped by the mythologies, folk legends and tales of other cultures. He is as apt to explore talmudic subjects as he is to probe Indian or Islandic legends. He did a series of portraits of people with tattoos, even venturing to Japan where the tattooing art has reached a zenith. He's also made paintings related to the legendary North American outdoorsman Paul Bunyan.

"He's Canadian, by the way," Bayefsky declares with evident pride, referring to the larger-than-life folkloric woodsman. "Although the Americans claim him, he's from a lumber camp in Quebec."

If eclectic, colorful, contemporary and universal are words that might be used to describe Aba Bayefsky, another is accomplished. A member of the Order of Canada, he is a former president of the Canadian Group of Painters, the successor group to the famed Group of Seven. He is also dedicated to his craft. Although the necessity of a twice-weekly dialysis treatment has slowed him down lately, he still usually spends five or six full days a week in his studio.

"I am never blank. I have more material in my mind today than I can possibly use in a lifetime. Years ago, I made the philosophical decision of who I am and what I wanted to do. In other words, I'm not under any pressure for inspiration. I don't have to stimulate myself; it's all there.

"It took a lot of time for me to decide that reality was central to my thinking, that art and politics go hand and hand. I'm not talking about party politics, I'm talking about what life is. I don't like to think I'm affected by fashions or fads. I'm very serious about my work and I think it's not trivial. I believe that what I have to say is important, and I take strength from that."

Schwartze Chassane (Black Wedding) for instance, shows a group of Jews dancing and drinking eerily in a cemetery. The story supposedly originated in the era after the War of 1812 when Opatow was struck with a devastating cholera epidemic.

"The rabbi decided to have a wedding in the cemetery to petition the dearly departed to intervene with the Lord to help them with the epidemic," Kirshenblatt explains. "They danced and drank amidst the graves until late at night, and sure enough, two days later the epidemic subsided."

One painting shows another wedding, this one involving a hunchbacked bride in an advanced stage of pregnancy; Kirshenblatt claims it is based on a real episode. "The groom didn't want to marry her but he was forced into it. Twenty minutes after the marriage she had a nice baby boy."

When he began painting, Kirshenblatt enrolled in art lessons but quit after the first lesson. "They have nothing to teach me," he told his wife Dora. Then he began producing his extraordinary canvases, which seem the work of a Jewish male counterpart to Grandma Moses. The perspectives are flattened, the figures stylized, the somewhat surrealistic compositions laden with telling details. The works are narrative in the sense that each one tells a story.

"My husband, he's the kind of person who when he looks, he sees," says Dora Kirshenblatt. "We were after him for 10 years to get him to paint."

Kirshenblatt is nothing if not prolific. The walls of his house are covered with his creations and dozens more are in storage. In conversation, he gives the impression that his brain is equally overflowing with artistic ideas. Yet when asked where his creativity comes from, he shrugs. "I don't know, it's just there." How does he choose his subjects? "I don't consciously decide on a subject. It just comes to my mind and I do it."

His goal, the spry octogenarian declares, is to leave a legacy of works that reflect the richness of life in pre-war Poland. "I certainly do not wish to minimize or diminish the experience of Holocaust survivors, but they talk as though there was no life in Poland before the war. I say there was a life in Poland before the war, a very rich cultural life."

Mayer Kirshenblatt

The more he contemplates and discusses that lost world, the more he remembers of it, he says. And his art seems to spark more art. "I have a dialogue with each of my paintings," he says, explaining that he would rather keep them than sell them. So far he has sold only a few works and has priced the others high to discourage would-be buyers who encounter them in exhibitions.

"The purpose of the paintings is to perpetuate the memory of Jewish life in the small towns of Poland. For someone to take one of them and hang it in his room, where no one else would see it, wouldn't be fulfilling the purpose. That's not what I want."

Kirshenblatt has had major shows at the Koffler Gallery, the Royal Ontario Museum, the YIVO Institute in New York and other important venues. Toronto-based filmmaker Jack Kuper made a short documentary, Shtetl, on Kirshenblatt several years ago, and an American publishing house is currently producing a coffee-table book about him and his art for release next year. He eventually intends to bequeath his collection of works to a major Jewish institution, perhaps the Jewish Museum in New York.

In the meantime, he seems content to continue with his art. "My wife thinks I'm an artist, my children think I'm an artist, but me, I don't know," he offers. "I don't paint because of the money. I paint because I have a compulsion to paint. It beats watching TV."

For most of his adult life North York resident Mayer Kirshenblatt's hobby was sailing and taking camping trips into the bush. But at his family's repeated urging, the retired paint-and-wallpaper merchant took up the painter's easel about 1990 to record on canvas the many colorful scenes he remembered from his boyhood in Poland.

Kirshenblatt was born in 1916 in Opatow (Apt), a town he left with his mother and siblings in 1934 to join his father who was already in Toronto. Sixty-four years later, he spends much of his time creating primitivist folk paintings that recount in loving detail how life was in the world he left behind – a world that is no more.

His paintings show diverse scenes of Jewish life, such as the busy marketplace, the interior of the synagogue, an old-fashioned klezmer band, a funeral procession with professional mourners, and family groupings on ceremonial occasions. The paintings are vivid, colorful, richly detailed, and imbued with the sort of magical varnish that only a lifetime of memory can supply.

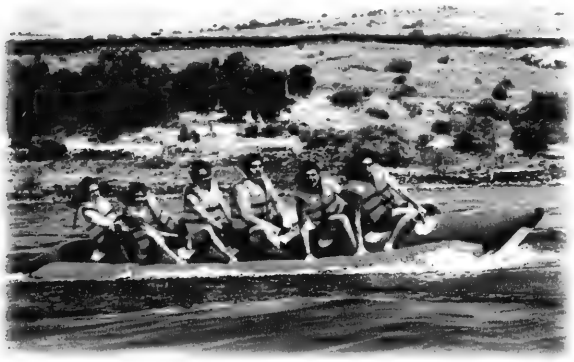
Canada Day on the Kinneret



Yom Canada (Canada Day) the largest gathering of Jewish youth in the world took place two weeks ago in Israel at Kfar Nofesh Amnun on the shores of Lake Kinneret. Sponsored by the Canada Israel Experience Centre, hundreds of Canadian youths in Israel for the summer on various Canada Israel Experience programs met at Amnun to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary. Their celebration included watersports, a rock concert, live theatre, a barbecue and fireworks display. It was an opportunity for all Canadian participants in the Israel Experience programs to meet.

The Inside Back

Preventing sexual harassment

The latest scandal involving alleged improprieties and intimate relationships among a district court judge, a member of the defence team (who had been his articling clerk) and the prime minister's spokesperson raises all sorts of legal and ethical questions.

It would be prudent to avoid making too many conclusions before we actually know what happened, but the story does raise the issue of sexual harassment in the workplace.

According to North American standards in recent years, virtually any relationship involving an employee and the person with power over her (or him) can be construed as harassment, since it is assumed that the employee is not in a position to make a real choice when a career is on the line.

On the other hand, Israeli attitudes have been different, looking to see whether there was in fact consent. The issue of whether the consent can be real in such situations has not been taken into account, and people have generally assumed that rational adults have the ability to make choices.

Thus, while many ethical issues have been raised in the context of the judge making overtures to his articling student leading to a relationship, few have suggested that she was a victim of sexual harassment.

In fact, a law passed recently bears directly on the question. The Law to Prevent Sexual Harassment, 5758-1998, passed reading in the Knesset on March 10. Section 3 (a) defines a list of actions which would be considered sexual harassment, including (but not limited to) repeated suggestions of a sexual nature to a person who has demonstrated that he or she is not interested.

The question, of course, is whether someone in a subservient position would feel free to demonstrate that he or she was not interested. Thus, the section creates certain presumptions, i.e. that such suggestions made to the following people, in the situations described, are considered harassment:

- a minor or helpless person, when the one making the suggestions takes advantage of a position of authority, dependency, education or treatment;
- a patient in the context of a medical or psychological treatment, when the person making the suggestions takes advantage of dependency;
- an employee in the context of an employment relationship or military service, when advantage is taken of a position of authority in such relationships.

Thus, when a person in authority takes advantage of the position to make sexual advances, it is considered sexual harassment, and in the employment situation, carries a punishment of two years imprisonment. If the victim can show that damage was caused as a result of the harassment or of the complaint, the jail term is three years. The victim may also receive compensation of up to 50,000 shekels (about $20,000 US). The statute of limitations is three years.

Furthermore, employers are now statutorily required to take steps to prevent sexual harassment in the workplace, including creating procedures for dealing with complaints and solving any such problems which arise. An employer who did not take these steps will be held liable for sexual harassment against employees in the place of work, even if the employer was not the one committing the harassment.

Opposition has been raised to the law, with critics arguing that it will stifle any real consensual relationships which might develop between people in the workplace, since if there is any kind of authority involved in the relationship, it is by definition illegal. To this, supporters of the law point out that when both parties consent, no complaint will be lodged. It remains to be seen whether that holds true after the relationship is broken off.

In any case, supporters of the law say that the chill it might place on office romance is a price worth paying to get the message across that sexual harassment is forbidden, and that there can be no real consent when one party is subject to the authority of the other.

The law may receive far fewer headlines than juicy stories of possible courtroom romances. Its supporters hope that it will nonetheless do much more to change attitudes and behavior, long after the recent scandals are forgotten.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Sonia and I have been best friends since we were in grade school. We've shared an apartment for three years, travelled through Europe, double dated together and have done almost everything there is to do while growing up. We are both 24 years old.

Sonia recently met a guy at a Jewish dance party. He seems nice; however, he certainly wouldn't have been my choice for her.

Since she met him about four months ago, I hardly ever speak to her and never get to see her anymore. She spends all her time with him and the excuses she has for not meeting me are endless.

I can't believe she has taken this guy, put him on a pedestal and tossed away our whole friendship.

I am angry and hurt and would like to know if you think I am out of line to feel this way.

Second to None

Dear Second to None,

I can understand the anger and hurt you are feeling. You are probably feeling a little left behind; however, you must realize that the two of you were going to Jewish dances to meet men. It's not realistic to think both of you would have met someone at exactly the same time.

The first thing you have to do is come to terms with the fact that there is someone new and obviously very important in Sonia's life. It's a new and exciting experience for her, and she is exploring and enjoying her relationship with this new boyfriend.

I believe the friendship the two of you had, has turned a corner onto a new road. Her head is probably in the clouds right now. However, it is not right for her not see or speak to you.

Try to be patient and let her explore this new avenue in her life. The things the two of you did together may be altered, as she is no longer looking for a mate and it's probably still a priority in your life.

Sonia probably doesn't realize how much she is hurting you. She is blissfully planted in her new world for the moment but the bond you and Sonia share goes far back. Give her some time and don't give up.

Lessons of unity mission being felt in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An innovative campus program run as a pilot project earlier this year is expected to have a long-term ripple effect.

In her capacity as religious affairs chair for the University of Toronto's Jewish Students' Union (JSU), Nesya Goldberg, a student at U of T, is already putting into practice what she learned on a Unity Mission run by Jewish Campus Services (JCS).

Goldberg, who is beginning her second year in the position, says the mission – a weekend study trip to New York that included visits to Jewish pluralist organizations like CLAL - The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership – has given her a new perspective.

"I don't think I've been changed as a Jew, but I think I've been changed as a person," said Goldberg. "The more I learn, the better person I become. If we're going to be the leaders of tomorrow, it's a good start.

"There are certain things we'll never agree on. I won't try to have a joint [Orthodox-Reform] prayer service, but I would add something to the blessings at the end of a meal. The lesson I took out of it is that we should be focusing on points we have in common."

The weekend was spent in "constant intense conversation," said student Sarah Kligman. Although as a Reform Jew she felt proud when the group visited Hebrew Union College, she said the most important lessons the students learned were from each other.

The trip opened Noam Samson's eyes to Conservative and Reform Judaism, the Orthodox student said. "I never really heard the theology from [rabbis and lay people] within the movements."

York University student Sidura Ludwig, the driving force behind the literary magazine Dorot, found the trip "challenging. It made me realize I'm not as tolerant as I like to think I am. Even I, who strive to be very tolerant, I have my boundaries."

For Tally Wolf, the importance of the trip was in coming together with others she would not have met otherwise, and learning that they can work together despite their differences.

Plans are under way for a second unity mission. The pilot, funded with a one-time endowment from Hillel International, has paved the way for JCS to receive a $5,000 grant from UJA Federation to underwrite this year's program.

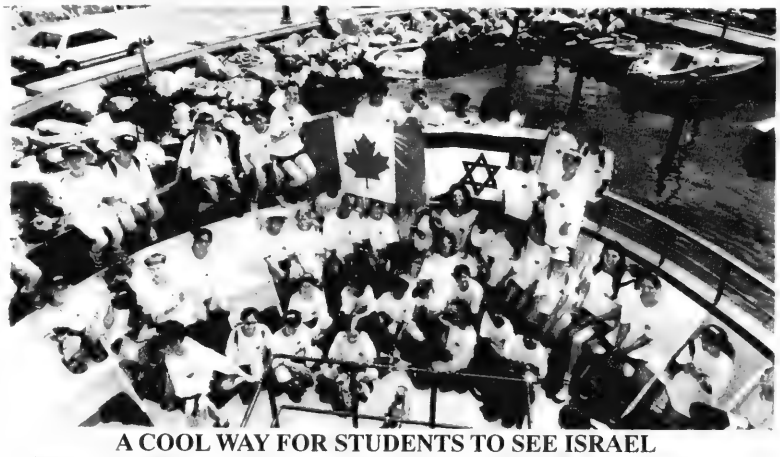
Applicants must demonstrate leadership qualities and a relationship with and commitment to Jewish life as well as to their particular movement, said Lance Davis, who was recently appointed JCS director of education. (Previously he served as program director at U of T's JSU.)

This year, as last year, said Davis, participants will explore Reform, Conservative and Orthodox Judaism. This year, however, the program will take place in December rather than late January to give students more time for follow-up activities. This year's alumni worked together to plan one program, a beit midrash in honor of Rabbi Michael Skobac, when he left JCS to work for Jews for Judaism.

The venue will also change this year. Participants will travel to Boston, where Davis hopes to tap into resources including Brandeis University and the local federation, which is "really a dynamic one in their approach to pluralism."

Davis based the program on one for lay leaders run by the Synagogue Council of Massachusetts. He participated in it about four years ago as a graduate student in Boston.

"We're really looking towards the future," said Davis. His hope is that the Unity Mission and programs like it will foster debate and ultimately dialogue.



A COOL WAY FOR STUDENTS TO SEE ISRAEL

Participants on Kefiada enjoy an excursion along Israel's coast. The summer program, whose name is derived from the Hebrew word meaning fun or cool, is sponsored by UIA Federations Canada and brings Canadian Jewish university students to Israel to work with youngsters at community centre camps.

Diaspora education debated

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Some 70 percent of Diaspora Jewish youth get no Jewish education, according to figures presented last week to the Knesset Immigration and Absorption Committee, which discussed Jewish education in the world.

The committee also reviewed a plan that would bring Jewish youths to Israel for 10-day visits in the year 2000, in a project jointly funded by the state and foreign donors.

"The state should take more responsibility on itself for the whole Jewish people, and be much more involved in the overseas communities," committee chair Naomi Blumenthal (Likud) said. "It's almost the only guarantee of the continued existence of the Jewish people in the Diaspora."

Israel to try to reduce Jewish school tuitions

Amos Hermon, who chairs the board of the Jewish Agency's education division, reported that only 30 percent of Jewish youth in the Diaspora get any Jewish education.

He said some 15,000 young people from western countries visit Israel annually at the initiative of the Jewish Agency, and another 100,000 Jewish youths take part in summer camps abroad operated by the Jewish Agency.

He said the Jewish Agency's operations are dependent on donated funds, which are dropping.

"The government must recognize that the young generation in the Diaspora represents a strategic asset and should invest suitable resources to bring the younger generation closer to Israel," Hermon said.

The prime minister's adviser for Diaspora affairs, Bobby Brown, told the committee the premier had agreed to establish a fund run by the state, Jewish groups and Jewish donors "which aims to bring every Diaspora Jewish child for a visit to Israel as early as by the year 2000."

He said the government is also acting to try to reduce the high tuitions in Jewish schools abroad.

Ukraine Jews surprise rabbi

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

KHMELNITSKI, Ukraine — Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz knows a lot about Jewish life in Ukraine.

But on a recent trip to Jewish communities and sites in southwestern Ukraine, the acclaimed talmudic translator and commentator still found a few surprises – one being that a large number of Jews here speak Yiddish.

In the small town of Shargorod, Rabbi Steinsaltz spoke Yiddish with Jewish passers-by in the old part of town, which once had a thriving Jewish community and now has only about 100 Jews.

Feature

Rabbi Steinsaltz, who usually lectures in Hebrew, also spoke in Yiddish to the communities he met on this trip.

While some of the Jews in their 40s and 50s here understand Yiddish, most of the speakers of the language of eastern European Jewry in Podolia, as this region is known, are older.

For Rabbi Steinsaltz, the lesson is clear: "The fact that Yiddish is widely understood here means that the process of assimilation in Ukraine is one generation behind the assimilation in most of the former Soviet Union," he said.

Rabbi Steinsaltz, a 61-year-old Jerusalem rabbi and talmudic scholar who has served as a spiritual leader for Jews in the former Soviet Union since 1995, travelled through the region earlier this month with a group of 20 Jewish community leaders from the former Soviet Union.

The group, known as Chaverim, consists of individuals who take part in Rabbi Steinsaltz-led seminars throughout Russia and Ukraine.

This time, most of the seminar was conducted on the bus while the group was travelling between cities.

Rabbi Steinsaltz told the students – aged 25 to 52 – about the life and writings of the chassidic leaders who once lived in the area. The students also studied parts of the Talmud.

TORONTO — Military artifacts from Israel's War of Independence are on display at the Silverman Heritage Museum of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The items are on loan from Yael Dunkelman, whose husband, Ben, was a distinguished colonel in the 1948 war of liberation. Among the artifacts are military insignia from all the brigades that fought in the War of Independence.

ISRAEL

Canadians Honored

JERUSALEM — At the 25th graduation exercises of the Jerusalem College of Technology – Machon Lev (JCT) two Canadians were recognized for their outstanding work on behalf of the college.

Henry Zieleniec was honored with the highest award the college presents, the Honorary Fellowship, for his longtime service to Jewish causes in general and to JCT in particular. Honorary Fellowships are awarded for outstanding achievement, professional excellence and dedicated community service.

Preceding the graduation ceremony, David Anisman was honored for his years of devotion to the college, the with dedication of the Sandra and David Anisman Garden on the JCT campus.

Immigrants Live in Poverty

HAIFA — Israel's absorption minister said steps must be taken to remedy a situation in which more than "90 percent of Ethiopian immigrant children live below the poverty line and 85 percent of them grow up in slums."

Yuli Edelstein made the comment during a ceremony honoring Yitzhak Dasa, a graduate of the University of Haifa Law School, who is the first member of the Ethiopian immigrant community to become a lawyer.

Israel Softens Demands

JERUSALEM — Israel softened some of its key demands in negotiations with the Palestinian Authority, according to Israeli media reports. But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said major issues were still in dispute, including the scope of a further Israeli redeployment in the West Bank and Jerusalem's demand that the anti-Israeli clauses in the Palestinian charter be rescinded.

Number of Apartments Up

JERUSALEM — Israel built twice as many apartment buildings in settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip during the first quarter of 1998 as it did in the same period last year, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. Israel built 730 apartment units, as opposed to 310 in 1977, the bureau said.

Israeli officials said the construction reflected natural growth in already-existing settlements. The Peace Now organization said the building activity proves that Netanyahu was not interested in peace with the Palestinians.

Israelis Urged to Fly BA

JERUSALEM — Haredi newspapers are urging their readers to fly British Airways instead of El Al or other carriers. The papers cite the modest dress of stewardesses on the British carrier and the film-free seating areas it has set up for its Tel Aviv runs. The call came as British Airways announced it would soon add one flight to its Tel Aviv-London route, bringing the weekly total of such flights to 15.

WORLD

Crosses Erected

AUSCHWITZ — Polish Catholics recently erected more than 50 crosses near the Auschwitz death camp. The crosses, which were reportedly put up by a Catholic workers group as part of a campaign, are standing near a crucifix set up a number of years ago to commemorate a visit by Pope John Paul II. Jewish groups have been seeking to remove all Christian symbols from areas surrounding the camp.

Workers Not Compensated

BERLIN — One of Germany's largest construction companies said it refused to compensate slave workers from World War II who helped build an airstrip for the company. Officials from Zueblin said the company was not liable because the laborers had worked for the Nazi SS. Volkswagen announced earlier this month it would create a fund to handle the claims of former slave workers.

Woman Chaplain Dies

NEW YORK — Rabbi Chana Timoner, the first Jewish woman to serve as a full-time chaplain in the U.S. army, died recently at age 46. Rabbi Timoner was endorsed to serve in the army by a chaplaincy division of the Jewish Community Centres Association of North America.

Rabbi Timoner began her religious training at the age of 33. She received her ordination from the Academy for Jewish Religion in New York City and studied for her doctorate at the New York Theological Seminary. She joined the Army Reserves at 39 and began her first full-time assignment a year later at Fort Bragg, N.C., where she served Jewish soldiers and their families, arranged holiday celebrations, conducted religious services, and directed children and adult Jewish education programs.

CJC Salutes Dominican Republic

JERUSALEM — At a special Israel Council on Foreign Relations meeting held here recently, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) joined other leaders in paying tribute to the Dominican Republic on the 60th anniversary of the Evian Conference.

CJC president Moshe Ronen and national executive director and general counsel Jack Silverstone recalled how 31 countries convened at the French resort town in July 1938 to discuss ways to find sanctuary for Jewish refugees fleeing from Nazi Germany and Austria. The Dominican Republic stood out among the rest and agreed to accept a significant number of involuntarily emigrants and provide facilities for their settlement, they noted.

"Sadly, even our own country of Canada was unwilling to help. The Canadian delegate announced that his country was only interested in accepting farmers, which was the equivalent of Ottawa barring Jews from seeking refuge there," said Ronen.

The event honored Dominican Republic Minister of Foreign Affairs Dr. Eduardo Latorre, who later met with Ronen. "I told him that Canada has a large number of Holocaust survivors and that they appreciate the efforts of [his] country.

CNE to feature Israel at 50 Pavilion

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — Tired of the midway and sick of the Food Building? Need a good reason to spend your hard-earned dollars on the Ex this year?

The organizers of the Israel at 50 Pavilion at the upcoming Canadian National Exhibition (CNE) think they have one for you.

"It's the largest celebration of Israel's 50th outside of Israel... It's the next best thing to being in Israel itself," says Karen Morton, chair of the Israel at 50 Pavilion.

In the planning since last August, the 107,000-square-foot pavilion in the new National Trade Centre (NTC) just inside the Princes' Gate is presented by the Israel at 50 consortium of 175 Toronto-area organizations, under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

Morton says the pavilion is aimed at non-Jews as well as Jews, given that organizers expect 1.5 million visitors and there are only about 160,000 Jews in the GTA.

The NTC will also house the CNE's feature country, the Philippines, which will occupy 60,000 sq. ft., and a 57,000-sq.-ft. international vendors pavilion.

Morton's 115-member committee originally envisioned a much smaller Israel at 50 exhibit that would tour local shopping malls. But CNE officials were excited when approached about featuring Israel, Morton says, since it's "one of their hot-button countries." She says CNE polling consistently ranks Israel among the top six potential feature countries people would like to see.

General manager David Bednar says the CNE expects the pavilion to help its overall attendance, but it's very difficult to know how much until exit and entrance research is done during the fair.

"Obviously, we think [the pavilion's impact on attendance will be] significant," says Bednar, adding that the Israel exhibit is one of four main attractions being promoted this year, along with the Philippines, a Disney show and a car show.

And although the CNE has received no advance indication of problems resulting from the Israel at 50 Pavilion, Bednar says, "It's fair to say that we're at a little higher security watch with this than we have been with others in the past."

The pavilion has been financed from corporate donations, volunteering and private "gifts in kind," such as lumber and gravel, Morton says, and the CNE is providing infrastructure and matching funds up to a yet-unspecified amount.

Because of the heavy volunteer contingent and gifts in kind, as well as the still-to-come donations, she says "there's just no way to give a price tag" for the exhibit, except that "it's the largest undertaking that the Jewish community has ever taken on."

Abraham is asked to sacrifice his son Isaac in this Greek-inscribed detail from a fifth-century Galilean mosaic to be featured at the Israel at 50 Pavilion at the 1998 CNE. [UJA Federation photo]

The pavilion's marquee attraction is a fifth-century mosaic from an excavated synagogue in the Galilean town of Tzippori, Israel. It depicts scenes relevant to Christianity, Islam and Judaism – including the sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham from Genesis.

Discovered in 1994 by a team of Hebrew University archeologists, it's the 45 ft. x 13 ft. mosaic's first trip abroad to a non-museum setting. The Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) is overseeing the mosaic's installation.

Another key piece of artwork is The Mission, a 38 ft. x 7 ft. mural by Toronto artist Dubi Arie depicting 4,000 years of Jewish history. To be featured in the pavilion's 12,000-sq.-ft. desert exhibit, it took the Israeli-born Arie 20 years to complete.

Morton expects the desert "is going to be a huge draw.

"When you see the the number of plants that are going in and the amount of sand, it's mind-blowing," she says.

Dispute simmering over kosher meat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A dispute is simmering between Levitt's meats of Montreal and Toronto-based COR.

Levitts, which has been under the supervision of MK, recently came under that of Star-K of Baltimore as well. Spokesperson Lorne Brookman told The CJN that the second hechscher would help the company sell its products in international markets.

Although details are sketchy, the dispute with COR appears to be about COR's refusal to allow Levitt's fresh meats to be sold in Toronto, although its packaged and vacuum-packed meat is available here.

Rabbi Mordechai Levin, executive director of COR, said that the kashruth of Levitt's is in no way in question.

Murray Brookman, owner of Levitt's, said that he has been told by COR at various times that the reason for the refusal is that he is not shomer Shabbat, or that Toronto is a "closed city." This term means that only meat slaughtered in Toronto can be sold in Toronto.

Brookman objected to both explanations. He said that Levitt's has been in business for 60 years, and so MK, the supervisory body in Montreal, which also insists on the owner of a kosher food business being a Sabbath observer, has invoked a grandfather clause in its hechscher.

As to Toronto being a closed city, Brookman pointed out that there is already a company under COR that imports meat slaughtered elsewhere.

Contrary to rumors circulating in the city, a lawsuit has not been commenced.

The problem is currently in the hands of lawyers for both sides. A meeting is planned for sometime in August.

Rabbi Levin said that he did not wish to comment on the situation until after that meeting.

The CJN will be following the story.

A look at recent events

I write these words on the eve of Tisha b'Av. As everyone knows, on the tear-stained parchment pages of Jewish history, many national sadnesses and calamities have been inscribed on this date. The rabbis therefore marked the day with melancholy and set it aside for individual and collective introspection.

Inasmuch as Tisha b'Av demands honesty and humility for true and sincere introspection, it is an appropriate backdrop to reflect upon recent developments in the Jewish world.

Israel is the centre of the Jewish world. It therefore makes sense to look there first.

Israel is an exciting, dynamic place, at the cutting edge of many educational, scientific, medical, artistic, military and industrial fields. But there are deep and very worrisome societal tensions.

The opposition parties had tabled a resolution calling for the dissolution of parliament, a tactic normally seen as a precursor to an election. The final vote was 60-6 in favor of the resolution. The prime minister and most of his coalition colleagues boycotted the vote, but even so it was viewed by most commentators and, more importantly, by the public, as a stunning rebuke to him.

Four members of the coalition supported the opposition proposal, including former finance minister Dan Meridor and three members of the Third Way party among whom was Prof. Alex Lubotsky, one of the seven members of the Ne'eman Committee who labored so hard and so purposefully to bring forward recommendations aimed at bridging the divide among the three streams of practising Judaism.

Also voting with the opposition was the former foreign minister of the government, David Levy, and the three other members of his Gesher party.

Opposition gambits and parliamentary ploys are the common stuff of all democracies. There was, therefore, nothing "new," in last week's opposition manoeuvre in the Knesset.

But still somehow, the one-sided outcome and the severely hostile nature of the verbal exchanges preceding the vote were symptomatic of a larger malaise with government and public institutions that appears to have grabbed hold of the country.

The peace process of course is the first tug upon the country's existential angst. The vast majority of Israelis support the process but are divided essentially into two camps as to the manner in which they should do so.

Thus the process drags, if not stagnates. And May 1999, the date by which the Oslo accords were to have been implemented, looms as a potential flashpoint.

But the peace process is "merely" the first of these existential tugs. There is also the ever-present, ever-tragic security situation on the northern border. Last week another soldier was killed and five more were wounded in southern Lebanon.

The economy is another tug. The exuberant industrial and commercial growth of the past half decade appears to have virtually halted. Unemployment is at a record high. Despite the rate of unemployment, however, there is the anomalous and particularly piercing fact that Israel employs a relatively high number of foreign workers. As of the end of 1996 there were nearly 160,000 foreign workers in the country, of whom, the Central Bureau of Statistics states, some 74,000 were in the country illegally.

The most disheartening development last week however, was the "reinjuring" of old ethnic wounds.

In an inexplicable demonstration of crude, self-indulgent pique, Knesset member Ori Orr chose to cast aspersions on an entire group of people, namely Jews of Moroccan extraction.

In an interview published last Wednesday in Ha'aretz, Orr made wildly generalized, outrageous comments about Israel's Moroccan Jews.

"I am really sad because I thought it would take less time to bridge the gap between us and the immigrants from the '50s," Orr said. "I now understand that the gap is still too wide. I expected a new leadership from the Sephardi community, sufficiently open to talk to people like me unreservedly, but this has not happened. High calibre individuals…have not emerged from among them."

Orr was clearly expressing frustrations, malign and misguided, that stemmed from the political failure of his party. "I am depressed because everything we have done for them has not helped at all. The fact that we raised the level of education, lessened poverty, set up a momentum for development and furthered the weaker layers, does not mean anything to them. You see, they voted for [Benjamin] Netanyahu in the last elections."

Orr's outburst was petulant and harmful. It perpetuated stereotypical, ignorant judgments about an entire group of people. This was inexcusable. He apologized. He was suspended from all official party positions. He may soon also be expelled from his party.

But far worse, as has been happening in other areas of collective Jewish society, Orr drew false and needless distinctions between Jews. He divided Jews. He created categories of Jews. He spoke of us and them.

The Knesset has recessed for three months. In the interim, and especially on the eve of Tisha b'Av, we must all reflect on whether we are relieving or contributing to the deep and very worrisome societal tensions.

School shows immigrant kids the beauty of Judaism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 20 years, Russian immigrant children have spent their Sundays at Orah School, discovering their Jewish heritage.

In the process, they also make new friends and have a great time, said Rabbi Yosef Michalowicz, co-principal, along with Dina Polyak.

The school is trilingual – English, Russian and Hebrew – and serves children who have just come from the former Soviet Union (FSU), have come via Israel, or those who have been in Canada for a while.

The difficulty of dealing with students who are working at different levels is addressed by the low student-teacher ratio. Every class has both a senior teacher, accredited by the Board of Jewish Education, and an assistant teacher, often a student from Bais Yaakov or Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The school day goes from 9:45 a.m. to 3:45 p.m., and includes a kosher lunch. Judaic studies, including davening, history, Jewish ritual and practices, and Hebrew language, are taught until 2:15, after which there is an hour and a half of Russian heritage.

"We really try to make the day fun," said Rabbi Michalowicz. There are a lot of games and "experiential learning," which is done through such activities as the Pesach carnival.

The school is very reality oriented, he said, with the students going to a matzah factory, visiting the kosher departments at IGA or viewing videos.

The children are often sent to public school because their parents want them to be Canadian, Rabbi Michalowicz said. "We want to show them that they can be both Canadian and Jewish. We want them to see the beauty of Judaism."

Attempts are made to make the students feel part of the community, and they participate in such things as the United Jewish Appeal Walkathon, a concert at Cheltenham Nursing Home, or in community contests.

Orah, which originally met at Eitz Chaim's Patricia campus, is now located at Associated Hebrew Schools Finch branch. There are 65 students enrolled between kindergarten and bar or bat mitzvah age.

The fee, for those who can pay, is $600. Many are on partial or complete subsidies.

Up to now, funding for Orah came mainly from Federation, through an Integration grant. Other funds come from the North York Board of Education International Languages program, from tuition, and from some fundraising.

Federation is now insisting that the school itself raise some $15,000 to $20,000, a daunting task considering the proportionately few Russian Jews who opt for a Jewish education for their children.

And that in itself is a concern, Rabbi Michalowicz said, noting that of the approximately 3,000 children of the 30,000 Russian Jews who are halachically Jewish, only about 500 are getting any Jewish education, whether at Orah, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, Aish Hatorah or in the day school system.

"That means the silent majority has nothing."

Besides fundraising, Federation wants to increase involvement by the Russian community. Currently, only one-quarter of the board is Russian.

Rabbi Michalowicz insisted that "it is the community's responsibility to help them. They maintained Yiddishkeit [in the FSU] for three generations – then they come here and lose it."

Tax rebate program a success for Mazon

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A program in which taxpayers donate their Ontario tax rebates towards the alleviation of child poverty and hunger has proven a roaring success, according to figures released recently by Mazon Canada.

Since being inaugurated in the spring of 1997, the program has raised more than $30,000. Mazon allocated $9,800 of that sum last spring, part of its $149,550 distribution to Canadian organizations addressing the issue of hunger in the community.

The spring allocation was Mazon's highest in its 11-year history, bringing to $1,389,045 the accumulated total of distributions since its launch in the spring of 1987.

The tax rebate program is the brainchild of Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, a member of Mazon's board of directors. Together with the social action committee of Temple Emanuel, Rabbi Bielfeld conceived of the tax rebate plan.

In other developments, Mazon continues to attempt to raise awareness of the issue of hunger in Canada. Mazon, which bills itself as the Jewish response to hunger, offers a speakers bureau, an educational program for children and a youth poster contest. It is planning a kosher gourmet food and wine tasting for the spring of 1999 and it is considering launching a Web site, if it can find a volunteer to design and set up the site.

At its annual meeting recently, Susan Davis was elected Mazon's president, taking over from Roger Hyman. Davis is former executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. Jeff Zeifman is Mazon's vice-president and Tammy Anklewicz continues as secretary/treasurer.

Horrors of apartheid regime prompted woman to action

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A dead child considered unimportant and its mother's grief insignificant, because both were black. A child with a cleft palate sent home after major surgery with no instructions or supplies for care, for the same reason. Apartheid.

Experiences like these in her work at Capetown's Groote Schuur Hospital opened the eyes and changed the life of speech pathologist Helen Lieberman, a native of South Africa.

"I was appalled at the attitudes I saw from the staff. I couldn't figure out why there was a different feeling about black people." Even she felt that way, she told The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

She began to look around her, and didn't like what she saw: synagogue officials who didn't understand the situation; segregated care, doors, elevators in her hospital; family maids who couldn't sit on the couch or use the indoor toilet.

"I couldn't live knowing that a few kilometres away there was decay. I became a wanderer, trying to change a situation enforced by a maniacal system."

Lieberman began to make secret visits to the black townships. She learned that 100 people lived in a tiny area, with one toilet and one tap. Hundreds of children whose mothers were working for the affluent white community were cared for by untrained women in a room with no ventilation or light, and forced to stay quiet by the threat of being beaten.

Housing was primitive at best. Those who worked in the cities had long, arduous commutes. Education was virtually non-existent.

She began, privately, "as a Jewish woman," to try to help the people in the townships by bringing medical supplies, teaching, founding schools (one school, Crossroads, was the first school Nelson Mandela went to after his release from prison), establishing seniors' centres.

Official reaction to her work was swift and uncompromising. She was threatened, constantly followed, and had her phone tapped. The police created a massive file on her. Periodically she was arrested.

She was especially hurt by the members of the Jewish community who cut her and her husband off, partly in disgust with what she was doing, partly in fear of being involved in illegal activity.

The unodoli direct catalogue produced by the non-profit community-based South African organization Ikamva Labantu features dark-skinned dolls made in disadvantaged South African black townships.

With the end of apartheid, she was asked to be partners with the government in various projects. "It was a tribute not to me, but to the process and the people," Lieberman said wryly.

She realized, she said, that although people had the vote, they were still locked in the cycle of poverty.

An organization called Ikamva Labantu (the future of the nation) was formed as a way of bringing financial stability to residents of the townships, especially the elderly and disabled.

Its workshops turn out dolls (black dolls, which, she said, were never available before) with colorful, sometimes native costumes, stuffed animals and puppets and dresses and backpacks in the shape of a lion, a zebra or a doll.

They are all handmade (stuffed by blind workers), in vibrant blues, greens, yellows, pinks, oranges.

Other workshops produce pottery, bricks, jewelry. A choir has achieved great results.

Why is she doing all this? First, she believes that "a Jew is not just a Jew for other Jews, but for all the world."

Even more so, though, is her blunt assertion, "I am African. I relate to [other] South African citizens as a part of me."

For more information about Lieberman or Ikamva Labantu, call Edye Troper, 416-531-7444, or fax 416-531-1666.

Blackmail too?

The Swiss government has written to the leaders of every American state and to the leaders of 15 major cities, strongly suggesting that they rethink the possibility of imposing sanctions on Swiss banks as a result of the still unresolved Holocaust-related claims upon the banks.

In a letter to the Americans, Alfred Defago, Swiss ambassador to the United States, and Thomas Borer, head of the Swiss committee dealing with Holocaust-related claims, warned that sanctions would be "a major mistake."

"We understand the strong emotions raised by this issue. But we are also deeply concerned that sanctions imposed against the Swiss economy could trigger a vicious circle of threats and counter-measures that could endanger the Swiss-American relationship, adversely affect open markets in financial services and ultimately derail a process that is designed to achieve justice for the survivors of the Holocaust," the two men wrote.

As reported in The CJN last week, a number of American states, including California, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Florida, have already taken punitive measures against Swiss banks for their unwillingness to arrive at a reasonable and honorable settlement. New York State and New York City may soon impose sanctions of their own. They have set Sept. 1 as the deadline for the Swiss banks to reach an agreement with the claimants.

Ironically, the Swiss government is not the only party urging a retreat from sanctions. The Clinton administration has also appealed for restraint in the matter. Washington has observed the hardening of attitudes within many circles in Switzerland – in high bureaucratic offices and in the low gutters of the street – on the subject of the unresolved Holocaust claims, and is worried lest U.S.-Swiss financial ties be impaired. Of course, the uppermost concern for Washington is jobs, specifically, the approximately half a million American jobs that are directly tied to Swiss firms.

But the uppermost concern for the claimants, for the Jewish community and, it is heartening to add – as attested by the bold actions of some American states – for countless, ordinary, decent Americans, is justice. It is, therefore, wistfully ironic to note the reference in the Swiss letter to the letter-writers' worry that the "process designed to achieve justice for the survivors of the Holocaust," might be derailed by sanctions.

The process is already derailed.

Talks between the Swiss banks and the claimants have broken off. They were suspended when the banks presented a take-it-or-leave-it offer of $600 million (US). By even the most conservative of estimates, their figure is many hundreds of millions of dollars inadequate.

But "the issue is not one of money," as Israel Singer, general-secretary of the World Jewish Congress, has repeatedly told the Swiss. The issue is "moral restitution."

Singer minced no words in describing the negotiating behavior of the banks. "We are ashamed of the lies that have been used to scuttle the talks. These talks did not break down by mistake. They were broken down by an absence of good faith, by an absence of fair play, by an absence of attempting to deal with the question of moral restitution."

Perhaps moral restitution is a concept the Swiss bankers do not comprehend. There is no line item for it on a financial statement; nor is it a required disclosure to shareholders and potential investors.

But it is a concept on which justice rests. And justice, as our sages have taught us, is one of the vital pedestals supporting the very survival of the world.

The record has amply shown, going back to the 1940s, that the Swiss banks have acted with deceit and dishonor. Will they now add blackmail to that list too?

Singles frozen out of Toronto Jewish community

Your recent article, "In Search of the 'perfect' Jewish Mate" (CJN, July 16), gave a limited and unremarkable account of the Toronto Jewish singles scene.

Let's get to the point here and mention what does not speak well of the Toronto Jewish community. A couple of simple questions expose its efforts as only parsimonious.

Which singles have the most difficult time connecting? Those that don't come from Toronto. And why? Because Torontonians are not very good at outreach or home hospitality with unaffiliated individuals whose backgrounds they do not know. And all the organized groups in the world do not bring out complaisant, home-based Torontonians. Those who already have circles of friends and routines have no need or desire to explore or extend themselves to those who may initially have a different status.

The same single people take part in all the services listed in the article. Different groups do not cater to different people. No matter which group it is, however "interesting" the speaker or event, most people are there with the same agenda – they want to meet someone and need help to do so. So called "artsy" people are not, as suggested, in a special category. The plain fact is that "organized" Jewish groups for single people in this city do not work. Those going to groups would really prefer to be with those who have no need to do so. But those circles are, in most cases, "closed."

And as for age boundaries, the new under and over 35 distinctions leave those in the 35 to 40 bracket on the cusp, and more displaced than ever. Ironically, it is they who are in most urgent need of connection.

The sad thing about all this is, according to Rebbetzen Esther Jungreis, "all the unborn babies waiting to be born, that won't be." Single Jewish women in their late 30s and early 40s, and there are many of them transplanted in Toronto, do not have time for articles such as "In search of the 'perfect' Jewish mate." No, they have not been "sitting around!" On the contrary…

Your article is unconstructive. Nothing new is discussed or suggested. Actions speak louder than words. For such a large Jewish population, we will have little to be proud of in terms of continuity possibilities through our singles! A "crisis" is already upon us!

Seeks residents of Polish orphanages

I recently came upon files and photographs of Jewish children who lived in several orphanages in Poland. They were admitted in 1945 and 1946. There's reason to believe some of them now live in Canada or the United States.

I would like to hear from them. They were as follows:

- 12 children in Otwock, born between 1934 and 1943;
- seven children in Srudborow, born between 1934 and 1938;
- tree children in Pietrolesie, born in 1935 and 1936;
- one child in Bielsko, born in 1936.

Altogether, there were 17 girls and six boys.

The files also contain the names of their parents' addresses and children's material circumstances before the war. The children's teachers comment on how they survived the war. There are also five letters dated 1948 and written in Yiddish, expressing thanks to an unknown benefactor.

Anyone who has information about this is asked to contact me at 416-636-9858.

Fears fatal traps in multiculturalism

Re: Editorial, "Multiculturalism is now part of the essence of our way of life." (CJN, July 9)

Has the CJN's editorial policy finally become a footnote to that of the Toronto Star, the CBC and the "anti-racism/multiculturalism" establishment?

This whole subject and its potential for fostering illusions and defencelessness in the Jewish community must finally be subjected to the cutting edge of open debate. Perhaps a wider cross-section of the Jewish community ought to be heard from than those who cannot stop chanting the mantra that multiculturalism is a win-win situation for all?

After all, is there anything more "multicultural" than the General Assembly of the UN? Has everyone forgotten the "Zionism is Racism" resolution of 1974? Are we setting ourselves up for a replay of the Buenos Aires slaughters of 1992 and 1994? At the hands of the same people? Let in the light on this subject. It's long overdue! Neglecting it may be fatal.

Those of your readers who might be interested in Daniel Goldhagen's answers to his critics, in particular, Norman Finkelstein and Ruth Bettina Birn, whose latest book, A Nation on Trial: The Goldhagen Thesis and Historical Truth, was reviewed by Sheldon Kirshner (CJN, July 9) should look at the Internet Web page [www.goldhagen.com].

There under the title, The Fictions of Ruth Bettina Birn, Goldhagen gives a detailed refutation to an earlier article she wrote on the subject. He gives 30 points where he claims his book is misrepresented by her.

Knesset members call a recess

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

In a 60-6 vote last Wednesday, the Israeli Parliament gave preliminary approval to a bill to dissolve the legislature, forcing new elections ahead of their slated 2000 date.

Observers have called the bill the most serious threat so far to Netanyahu's two-year-old government, though the measure still faces three additional votes, each of which will require support from at least 61 of the 120 Knesset members.

If the bill ultimately passes, new elections for the Knesset and for prime minister will be called.

"Let's see them get 61 votes," Netanyahu said the day before the preliminary vote, which he dismissed as "insignificant."

Just the same, the Knesset ended its summer session in a defeat for the prime minister that seems to augur a politically hot three-month recess rather than the relaxed break that some of the lawmakers, and perhaps Netanyahu himself, might have hoped for.

The move comes amid growing disenchantment from the opposition – and from within the governing coalition – with Netanyahu's handling of the peace process. Indeed, as the Knesset adjourned last week, the long-awaited redeployment accord with the Palestinians remained elusive.

No breakthrough was reported in the ongoing discussions between Israel and the Palestinian Authority on the U.S. proposal regarding a further Israeli redeployment from the West Bank. But the two sides agreed that the talks would continue.

Netanyahu's discomfiture, however, was softened somewhat by a furor that arose before the vote around remarks made by Labor Knesset member Ori Orr, who disparaged Sephardi Jews, and Moroccan Jews in particular, in an interview with the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

The prime minister, addressing the Knesset, sought to focus public attention on Orr's remarks and away from the early elections bill. Orr was roundly criticized across the political spectrum.

Labor Party chair Ehud Barak, who last year publicly apologized for the suffering Jews from Middle Eastern and North African countries endured in the early years of the state, said it would take a long time to mend the damage Orr had caused the party. Barak immediately removed Orr from a high-powered Labor delegation that went to Washington.

Netanyahu's efforts in the run-up to the vote to persuade coalition rebels not to break ranks failed abysmally. Together with the chief coalition whip, Likud Knesset member Meir Sheetrit, the premier ordered coalition members to stay away from the vote.

But three members of the Third Way party voted for the bill, and the fourth member, Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, made it clear that he, too, supported the measure. His position as a Cabinet member barred Kahalani from voting with the opposition.

Levy and three other members of his Gesher party cited the latest unemployment figures as evidence of the government's failed economic and social policies.

Likud Knesset member Meridor, with his vote, signalled publicly for the first time his irrevocable breach with the premier, and, in the view of many observers, his intention to challenge Netanyahu for the premiership.

Veteran parliamentary observers recalled that when a bill of this kind passed a preliminary vote on previous occasions, representatives of the two main parties would subsequently get together privately and begin looking for a date to hold new elections.

Even if those precedents are not repeated this time, last week's vote was important.

Binyamin Alon, of the far-right Moledet Party, for instance, fully intended to join with the left wing, including the Arab parties, in voting to bring Netanyahu down. Only Netanyahu's last-minute decision to boycott the vote prevented this hemorrhaging on his right flank – Moledet's two votes would have brought the total in support of early elections to 62.

Both sides of this anti-Netanyahu front have cited, but for different reasons, his stance in the stalemated peace talks as the justification for seeking to bring him down.

Members of the Yisrael Ba'Aliyah party, which is headed by Trade and Industry Minister Natan Sharansky, were also contemplating voting for the bill – on the grounds that the prime minister's oft-repeated promises to conclude an agreement with the Palestinian Authority by the end of the month were melting under the torrid summer sun. But they too were saved, for the moment, by the boycott tactic.

On the face of it, the hard-core right could allow itself a satisfied sigh of relief at the passing of the end-of-July deadline without the premier's having concluded the accord with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu is understood to have agreed, after months of hesitation and pressure, to the U.S. proposal under which Israel would withdraw from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for Palestinian steps to improve security.

But there is still argument over the precise conditions under which three percent of that total would be turned over to the Palestinian Authority.

At the urging of Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, Israel's position reportedly softened this week, and direct talks with the Palestinian side resumed with a sense that the redeployment issue was nearing resolution.

But Netanyahu, despite the urgings of Mordechai and other cabinet moderates, was still digging in his heels over an Israeli demand that the Palestine National Council, the PLO's parliament-in-exile, be convened to abrogate the anti-Israeli provisions of its charter.

The far right, however, was not prepared to rely too confidently on this last holdout by Netanyahu. As a result, some of its members favored the bill for new elections.

The right's distrust of Netanyahu on the redeployment has also prompted the National Religious party and others in the "Greater Israel caucus" to insist that Netanyahu promise in writing that if he reaches an agreement with the Palestinian Authority during the three-month summer recess, he will bring it before a special session of the Knesset and regard the vote on it as vote of confidence in his government.

But because Knesset rules say there cannot be a confidence vote during the recess, some on the right fear that Netanyahu may deliberately reach a deal with the Palestinians within the next three months, comfortable in the knowledge that the Knesset cannot vote to bring him down.

All this hardly reflects an atmosphere of mutual trust among coalition members.

While the Netanyahu government is still intact, it's unlikely to be a peaceful summer for the premier as the early election bill's proponents prepare to move forward on the legislation in the fall, when the Knesset reconvenes.

Even as issues were being disputed and protested inside the Knesset last week, these protesters took up their cause outside the Knesset, demanding the immediate withdrawal of the IDF from Lebanon. [Israel photo]

Don't know much about history...

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Famous sayings about history: History is more or less bunk (Henry Ford); those who do not study history are condemned to repeat it (Santayana); just one damn thing after another (anon.); history is a nightmare from which I am trying to awake (James Joyce's Stephen Daedelus quoting Schopenhauer).

Or Modris Ecksteins, in describing the post World War I literature that reinterpreted the war experience for the so-called lost generation, "The real war had ceased to exist in 1918. Thereafter it was swallowed by imagination in the guise of memory."

Also: "History was not in the past; history was a magical dream that motivated men to action in the present."

Miracles are the antithesis of history. They are by definition occurrences with no natural or rational explanation or origin, out of our control, and history, we are taught, is created by the actions of humankind: David and Goliath; Moses in Egypt; Macabbees against the Greeks; conquering Canaan; rebuilding the Temple (once); finding the way back from exile; finding the way back to Israel.

As Jews, we dote on history, citing it for every holiday we celebrate, every dollar we contribute. History, the ordering of past events in some sensible fashion in order to better understand them, is not for the faint-hearted. There is always someone ready to hit you with a bigger stick, a better explanation, or, in our case, a miracle that history can't explain.

Maybe in our present state – I am talking about that current impasse, progress in peace talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians – we'd be better off to heed Carlyle: "happy the people whose annals are blank".

Everyone can hardly wait to get their piece of history up front in order to prove that history is on their side:

Bibi: History teaches us that if we don't hit hard and first we'll get whacked, and end up like the last time, exiled or dead.

Yassir: History is on our side; we have the world's ear, we have been here longer than the Jews, and besides they stole it from us and everybody knows it. The Jews declared their state without permission and so will we.

The Settlers: God gave us the right to bulldoze every square inch of the land from the sea to the river Euphrates and we are gonna do just that. If you don't like it we'll shoot you.

Hamas: Ditto, but we'll blow you up.

The Religious Right in Israel: God gave us this land and it was a miracle that Israel came into being even though at the time we were dead set against it. Now we love every rock and holy place of which there are thousands where miracles occurred and we need money for our students to study them.

The Left: If we give back a reasonable portion of land for peace we can work this out, and besides history teaches us that we defended ourselves before and we can do it again.

I go with Ecksteins on this one. Everyone in this mad scramble to come up with a solution acts as if "history was not in the past; history was a magical dream that motivated men to action in the present."

What are some elements of that magical dream? One, that modern Israel is a miracle. No. Israel was born out of Jewish desperation after a horrible Holocaust; but if the British Empire had not been destroyed by that conflict, there would have been no state. It was a vicious struggle, but the Arab armies were no match for the Jewish guerrillas, being themselves divided and without a coordinated war plan. Similarly, the Hasmoneans conquered a Syrian Greek kingdom, weakened fatally by internal bleeding.

When the Jews took on Rome at the height of her power they were squashed like bugs, albeit inflicting a sting to Rome's heel.

Two, that 1967 was a second miracle. Again, no. A tough battle but not a miracle. A war won by real soldiers bleeding real blood against a poorly coordinated enemy. If 1967 was a miracle, what was Israel's sin in 1973 that she almost got whacked?

If we are expecting another miracle – the Palestinians will get tired and go home, then we are going to be very surprised and disappointed.

History and miracles don't mesh. We can have "imagination in the guise of memory" and think that next May some great miracle will save us. We are fooling ourselves. But not anybody else.

We should be concerned about ICC

By Bruce Elman in Edmonton

For many people around the world, July 17, 1998 will be heralded as a great day for the protection of human rights. In Rome that day, 127 nations signed the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), setting the stage for the establishment of a permanent Nuremberg-style international court to try war criminals and perpetrators of genocide, crimes against humanity and crimes of aggression.

These same people will, undoubtedly, herald the creation of the ICC as a fitting tribute to the 50th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. UN Secretary General Kofi Anan, for example, called the Rome agreement "a gift of hope" and "a giant step forward…towards universal human rights and the rule of law." Canadian diplomat Phillippe Kirsch called it "humankind's finest hour."

Canada played a leading role in drafting the Rome Statute and in ensuring its overwhelming adoption. The United States and Israel, however, objected to the statute's text and were among the seven nations who opposed the agreement. As Canadian Jews supportive of Israel, this should give us cause for concern.

The fact is that the Rome agreement suffers from serious flaws. On a general level, the agreement is flawed in terms of the court's jurisdiction and apprehension powers. Most war crimes tribunals suffer from these two problems. For example, the UN War Crimes Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has failed to bring any of the serious war criminals to trial.

A third flaw with the Rome Statute is that it permits public interest groups to ask the court to initiate proceedings. This will undoubtedly generate numerous frivolous and vexatious complaints. The prosecutors' office will determine which complaints will be pursued as meritorious. This gives great power to a group of functionaries who, unlike our domestic prosecutors, are largely unaccountable to any elected body.

In regards to Israel, there are two major difficulties with the Rome agreement. The first is the inclusion of crimes of aggression within the Court's mandate. Unlike such terms as genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes, which have a well-understood meaning and are further defined in the statute, the definition of crimes of aggression is unclear and ill-defined and is susceptible to political interpretation and manipulation.

The second and more serious problem is a clause by which the transfer of population of an occupying country to the territory of an occupied country would constitute a war crime and anyone who was directly or indirectly involved with such an action would be considered a war criminal. This clause was promoted by the Arab states with the sole purpose of labelling Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza as war crimes.

These Arab states want to equate the establishment of settlements with the Nazi policy of forced transfer of populations and the Serbian policy of ethnic cleansing. These Arab states want to equate Ariel and Efrat with Auschwitz and Majdanek. Whether one agrees with the establishment of the settlements or not, the idea that they constitute a war crime is absurd and laughable. That my country has agreed with this absurdity is an affront to me as a Jew and as a Canadian.

Imagine this scenario: An Israeli political, industrial or military leader who has been involved in some way with the decision to create a settlement in the territories comes to Canada at the behest of one of our Zionist groups. An Arab organization asks the ICC to investigate this individual as a war criminal because of his involvement in settlement creation. Canada as a signatory to the Rome Statute is asked to hold the individual while an investigation proceeds because the individual is alleged to be a war criminal. Canada might actually feel bound to hold the individual or – given the way that Israel is usually treated in UN organizations – even transfer him or her to the ICC if a decision is made to prosecute. Is it any wonder that Israel voted against this absurd possibility?

All is not lost, however. The Rome Statute needs 60 countries to ratify it before it comes into existence. Three major powers – China, Russia and the United States – voted against the Rome Statute. The United States in particular is opposed to the court in its present form. One can hope that these countries will prevail on other states not to ratify the agreement. In Canada, treaties do not come into force unless enacted domestically. This gives us an opportunity to lobby our legislators to make changes to the text of the statute. Perhaps discussions with our members of Parliament will produce some sober second thought on these matters.

July 17, 1998 – Humankind's finest hour? I think not!

Do you know about dyspraxia?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

At a recent rabbinical conference in California, I attended a seminar dealing with Jewish responsibility toward mentally and physically challenged persons.

The sponsor of the seminar was a group called Lehiot (pronounced Lee'yot), a Hebrew word which means "to be." The idea behind it is simple: all people have the right to strive for whatever they are capable of being.

Although I was familiar with many of the issues involved, I learned a great deal. One of the speakers told of a child who, when talked to, was incapable of answering and therefore was dismissed as "retarded."

In fact, the youngster had a condition of an entirely different kind. It was not that he was "a slow learner," but rather that he was a different learner. His condition is identified as dyspraxia (also sometimes called apraxia). In a way, it may be compared to dyslexia,which prevents a reader from reading in one direction because his mind skips to the other direction (in time, the condition can be overcome through adaptive learning). So it is with dyspraxia: no retardation of any kind is involved, merely a difficulty in coordinating the muscles needed for speech. This too can be overcome once it is recognized, but meanwhile the youngster is likely to be subject to neglect and often abuse, because children have a tendency to be cruel.

Our seminar aimed at raising our awareness of irregularities that affect many people in various ways and at various ages. Human rights codes have come around to recognizing that "handicaps" (as the codes call such conditions) can lead to discrimination of many kinds, and that society is obligated to give every person a proper chance.

The Torah warns us not to curse someone who is deaf or put a stumbling block in front of someone who is blind (Leviticus 19:14). Literally understood, making buildings, personal facilities, telephones, drinking fountains and many other things available to those who might otherwise be unable to use them, can be seen to be addressed by the biblical command.

I was no different from most others – I tried to support all the right things and still did not see everything that I should have seen. The turning point for me came when my mother (may she rest in peace) fell one day, and thereafter had to use first a walker and then a wheelchair. With that, I became aware of various obstacles I had never noted. It is easier to learn when such matters affect you personally.

Nowadays I look around wherever I go, to see whether facilities are accessible – but physical barriers are really the least of the problems. More important are the barriers to awareness, the lack of interest and concern. "It's too expensive" is the usual response when changes are asked for. But once awareness reaches its full dimension and our religious obligations become commanding forces in our lives, accommodation is rarely too expensive or too difficult. All of this gives me a special opportunity to say thanks to Rabbi Joseph Kelman who has been a pioneer in this area and who, by establishing Reena, has put all of us in his debt.

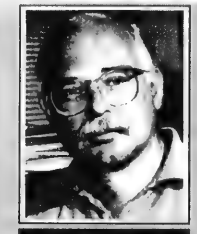
Palestinian state is taking shape

Last month, the Palestinians took another step forward toward statehood when the General Assembly voted to upgrade their status at the United Nations.



By Sheldon Kirshner

By a vote of 124 to four, with 10 abstentions and 26 countries not present, the UN granted the Palestinians' observer mission the right to participate in General Assembly debates, to co-sponsor resolutions on Mideast issues and to take part in UN meetings and conferences.

Apart from Israel, the only nations voting against the resolution were the United States, Micronesia and the Marshall Islands, an indication of the fact that Palestinian statehood in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip is increasingly viewed as an essential component of a fair and realistic Middle East peace agreement.

The Oslo accords do not contain a provision for a Palestinian state, one of the reasons the present Israeli government adamantly opposes full-fledged statehood. But the Palestinians joined the Oslo process on the implicit understanding of ultimately achieving it.

On this question, the Palestinians are absolutely firm.

"This is a matter of justice and practicality," A.S. Khalidi, a leading Palestinian intellectual, wrote last year. "If a truly lasting and stable peace is the goal, there is no other option."

Nabil Abu Rudeina, an advisor to Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestine Authority and chair of the Palestine Liberation Organization, is just as emphatic. "We feel that there will be no security and no peace for anyone without the establishment of a Palestinian state..." he said in a recent interview.

Arafat himself has set the tone by promising to declare statehood, unilaterally if necessary, at the end of the five year interim period of Palestinian autonomy in May 1999.

The transitional period was set into motion when Israel and the PLO signed the Oslo accord in Cairo on May 4, 1994. Under its timetable, Israel and the PLO were to have entered into permanent status talks two years ago in May to resolve such incendiary matters as final borders, Jewish settlements beyond the Green Line, Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

The previous Israeli prime minister, Shimon Peres, launched ceremonial final status negotiations on the eve of his narrow defeat in the May 1996 general election. Benjamin Netanyahu, his successor, has left them in abeyance as bilateral talks between Israel and the Palestine Authority have come to a grinding halt.

Public opinion in Israel is sharply divided with respect to a Palestinian state, but in a recent survey, just over 50 percent of Israelis came out in favor of one.

The Labor party, after years of opposition and waffling, now supports the formation of a Palestinian state. Peres, its former leader, said recently that statehood is inevitable.

On the other hand, the Likud and its right-wing coalition allies remain appalled by the idea of a full-blown state, claiming it would jeopardize Israel's existence. But even here, opinion is gradually shifting.

In a series of statements, Netanyahu has declared that he prefers a "third way" between "subjugation and unbridled self-determination," a solution that will balance the Palestinians' yearning for freedom with Israel's need for security.

The closest he came to spelling out his vision was when he proposed "a model of a state like Puerto Rico or Andorra" without "complete sovereignty." The Palestinians, he said on another occasion, "should have all the powers to run their lives and none of the powers to threaten Israel."

David Bar-Ilan, Netanyahu's director of communications, has been more specific.

A Palestinian entity, he said, should not be able to form military alliances with Israel's enemies, should not allow foreign forces on its territory, should not control the air space over Israel and should essentially be demilitarized.

In this sense, both Netanyahu and Bar-Ilan have shifted public debate. In principle, they are no longer against a Palestinian state per se. As hawkish cabinet minister Ariel Sharon put it last November: "Despite the fact that Israel does not want it, a Palestinian state is coming into existence."

The focus now is how Israel can drastically limit such a state's capabilities, a far cry from the days when the Likud was inalterably against Palestinian statehood in any form.

Although the Likud is still full of diehards who cringe at the very thought of Palestinian independence, the party's whip, Meir Shitreet, has called for the creation of a Palestinian state. In another sign of the times, Avraham Stern of the National Religious Party and Yehuda Lankri of the Gesher faction said that they support statehood under certain circumstances.

For all intents and purposes, the Palestinians have already embarked on statehood. The Palestine Authority fully or partially controls 27 percent of the West Bank, including all its major towns, and about two-thirds of Gaza. If Israel finally accepts an American plan calling for a 13 percent redeployment from the West Bank, the Palestinians will be in charge of 40 percent of its land mass, but on a non-contiguous basis. They seek total control of these territories.

Within the autonomous areas, the Palestinians also fulfill other prerequisites of statehood. They rule more than 90 percent of the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza. They have their own political, judicial, administrative, economic, social and religious institutions. They have a police force, a flag and a national anthem. They issue postage stamps. And they enjoy widespread international backing.

In other words, a Palestinian state is taking shape before Israel's eyes, a fact increasing numbers of Israelis recognize. Asked whether a Palestinian state would pose a strategic threat to Israel, Gen. Amnon Shahak, the former chief of staff, was revealingly tight-lipped. As he put it: "We have to learn to live with (the Palestinians)."

In honor of Israel's 50th anniversary, Bar-Am has produced a handsome coffee-table album entitled Israel: A Photobiography (Distican), with a thoughtful essay by Thomas Friedman, an award-winning American journalist with whom he has worked.

Bar-Am's photographs, in black and white and in color, convey drama and poignancy, and cover topics running the gamut from everyday life and immigrant absorption to war and peace-making.

Flipping through its glossy pages, I was particularly struck by his kinetic compositions of a jumble of Israelis scanning the sky during an Independence Day flyover; of David Ben-Gurion at work and at leisure; of newly-arrived Soviet women exchanging gossip on an empty street; of an Israeli man, a gun protruding from a holster, barbecuing a meal.

I was also impressed by Bar-Am's piercing photographs of an Israeli soldier, bullets draped over his shoulders, at the Western Wall in the wake of the Six Day War; of a group of Israeli troops and Egyptian prisoners of war caught together in a Yom Kippur War bombardment; of a group of Israelis looking down at the Sea of Galilee from a former Syrian fortification on the Golan Heights; of Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat deep in conversation; of Ethiopian immigrants bunched up in an airplane during Operation Solomon; of Israeli soldiers evacuating Yamit, the doomed Sinai settlement; of beehives near Mt. Tabor; of an Israeli family, gas masks on their faces, waiting out the Gulf War with their unprotected cat.

Our sense of history weighs heavily on us

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It is said that Napoleon would periodically don commoner's garments and venture out amongst the people. This he did to maintain his sense of those he led and sometimes felt far removed from.

During one of these outings, he chanced on a dimly lit synagogue full of wailing worshippers. Intrigued, he entered, and like everyone else, sat on the ground. At the conclusion of the soulful service; he inquired as to what wretched tragedy had befallen these people that would cause them to grieve so.

Upon hearing that it was Tisha b'Av, a day commemorating the destruction of the Temples, 1,900 years and 2,400 years ago respectively, Napoleon is said to have exclaimed: "If this people, year in and year out, commemorate their defeats of millennia ago, then they truly are an eternal people."

Napoleon was impressed with our sense of history. While mighty nations have come to occupy centre stage, these same mighty nations have all dimmed and fled. The Jewish people on the other hand persist.

Our sense of history weighs heavily on us. As a people belonging to a nation, our fortunes wane and wax. History repeats itself, and history is a powerful teacher. Mistakes, too, are powerful teachers. One can learn from the mistakes of history. As serious students of the past, we have no reason to repeat again and again the wrongs of yore.

Our attachment to our past sets the course for our future. For those who participated in and experienced the commemoration of Tisha b'Av as a painful day of remembrance, this week of Shabbat Nachamu will follow with its message of comfort and encouragement. To those who do not pause for the tragedies of our people, the consolations too are just as meaningless. Our sense of history is synonymous with our sense of destiny as a people. To be an eternal people is to live today with the past of yesterday.

Our God, too, is a God of history. "I am the Lord your God, Who took you out of Egypt." This introduction is not one of God the Creator, or the God of heaven and earth, but the God of history.

Jewish history records that Jewish destiny belongs exclusively to those who choose to study and practise their Jewishness. Only in this manner will we join and become one with the eternal nature of our people. "For it is a tree of life to those that grasp it."

Zionism is dead, long live Zionism

By SHAWN ZELIG ASTER

A hundred years after Theodor Herzl prophesied the establishment of the State of the Jews, and 50 years after David Ben-Gurion did so, no one can say that Zionism has not been a success. But is it alive?

Guest Voices

In honor of the 100th year of Zionism, the World Zionist Organization could come up with no better slogan than "Zionism is doing – today, tomorrow and in the future." To do what? They didn't say.

In a sense, Zionism has succeeded itself to death. The State of the Jews has been established; Israel is secure, has a high standard of living and is no longer the most endangered state in the Middle East. What remains for Zionism to do?

Zionism began as a solution to a particular historical problem. The Jews of Europe at the end of the Emancipation yearned for an end to persistent anti-Semitism, an end to discrimination and a chance to live like any normal nation.

But that historical problem is no longer relevant. Are there any countries left where Jews live as a persecuted minority?

In its place we have a new historic problem. No Jewish state in history has survived more than a century. Seventy years after David established his rule over all of Israel, Solomon's kingdom split into north and south. The Maccabean kingdom fell victim to a civil war after a similar period and became a Roman protectorate. And when the Jews rose in revolt against the Romans in 67 CE and declared independence, internecine fighting ended the revolt faster than the Romans might otherwise have done.

The plain truth is that more divides Jews than unites us. We were once divided by tribal origin. Now we are divided by ethnic origin, and we are still divided on issues of politics and religion, albeit in different ways.

If you will it, it is no dream

A nation-state requires a common conception of nationhood in order to survive, especially a nation-state that is geographically isolated. At minimum, it requires a way to deal with differences that place a premium on the desire to live together.

Can such a formula be found? Is it possible to convince people as radically different as Aviv Gefen and Moshe Gafni that they have enough in common to make being part of the same nation worthwhile? Is it possible to convince the far left and the extreme right that a way to live together is worth finding?

This is the challenge of Zionism today. For 100 years, Zionism has been led by a desire to solve a historic problem that is now solved. But though that problem is solved, a new one has been created. The State of Israel will celebrate its 100th jubilee only if some progress is made on this issue. We do not need to eliminate disagreement. But we do need to have a sense that what unites us is greater than what divides us. And we do need to agree on ground rules to deal with conflicts created by the chasms in Israeli society.

It is possible to create these two conditions? Fifty years ago, Communists such as Meir Wilner and members of Agudat Yisrael signed Israel's Declaration of Independence, emphasizing their striving towards a common goal. Could this be brought about today? If you will it, it is no dream.

Good news — relatives in Israel are doing well

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mollie Posen was so delighted to receive a recent family photo from her cousin Shlomo Bogner in Haifa that she called The CJN in the hope of having it published.

"Here is something joyful," said the energetic 88-year-old, aiming to counterbalance more distressing news that makes it into print.

Posen now has over a dozen relatives in Israel, she notes, pointing to the picture. After the Holocaust, she knew of only four surviving family members who made aliyah.

Although Posen, née Malka Pomerantz, immigrated to Canada with her father in 1920, in some ways she too feels like a survivor, she says, because of the relatives she lost during the Holocaust.

In fact, she is determinedly seeking to have a Jewish organization take on a tzedakah box project in memory of the million and a half Jewish children who died in the Holocaust.

Bogner – known to Posen as Salek, not Shlomo – was born in 1937 in Narajow, Poland, and spent his early years in the nearby village of Buszcsze, where Posen had spent her childhood.

Posen's mother had died when she was two; a younger brother lived only a few months. As a young girl in Poland, Posen lived with her grandmother and was taught by a hired teacher who lived with the family. Her dozen classmates were her cousins, among them Bogner's father.

Posen spent her first two years in Canada living with an aunt in Peterborough while her father, who had been a melamed in Europe, sought to make a living in Toronto as a tailor.

Although Posen knew no English when she arrived, she soon excelled in school and was a frequent customer at the public library.

Now a grandmother of five, she married in her early 20s and raised two daughters.

Meanwhile, Bogner's father was shot dead outside his home in 1941, and life as the young boy knew it – living with his parents and extended family on their large property – was over.

He and his mother went to her parents in the Narajow ghetto. When his mother heard of an imminent Nazi round-up, she sent her young son to hide in the forest with neighbors, not wishing to abandon her ailing parents. He never saw her again.

The neighbors took him to his paternal grandmother and uncle, with whom he spent the war in hiding. At one point, they were hidden in a church attic by a priest who knew the family. After German officials set up shop next door, they moved on.

The Polish couple who hid them in a basement, Jan and Olga Morozowski, were subsequently honored by Yad Vashem.

Bogner, now a surveyor at the Technion, moved to Israel in 1957. He and his wife Rachel have two grown sons, a grandson and a granddaughter.

It wasn't until 1968, when Posen visited Israel for the first time, that the two cousins met. She has been back three more times.

"I was so excited," she recalls of her first visit. "I grabbed Salek's hand and I kissed it. I had never met him, but [his family] never left me. This was the family I was bonded with."

Bogner's elderly grandmother, whom Posen recalled from her childhood as "a very charming lady," took one look at Posen and called her by her mother's name. Posen has never seen a picture of her mother, but muses, "I must look exactly like her."

Finding Sephardi music on-line

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The saddest period of the Jewish calendar is finally over. Tisha b'Av and the three weeks preceding it mark the destruction of the Temples and many other tragedies that have befallen the Jewish people.

With that period of semi-mourning behind us, we can now raise our spirits and look forward to this week's joyous holiday of Tu b'Av [http://www.virtual.co.il./city_services/holidays/tubav/]. So what better time than now to travel the Jewish Highway and listen to Jewish music with a Sephardi flair.

To understand the development of Sephardi music, I highly recommend two sites. Take a look at Exhibition Sefardic Music which was created to coincide with last November's International Jewish Music festival in The Netherlands, Belgium and Germany [http://www.joods.nl/jmf/en-exsefard.html]. And don't miss Moshe Denburg's Jewish World Music site [http://www2.portal.ca/~jsiegel/jm.html]. Denburg traces the evolution of the various streams of Jewish music. What I found most interesting is that he differentiates between "Sephardi" and "Mizrachi" music. Sephardi refers to music that originated around the Mediterranean, from Spain and North Africa to Turkey and Greece, that can trace its origins to the thriving Jewish culture of Spain. Much of the musical repertoire is in Ladino (Judeo-Spanish), a 15th-century version of Spanish [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=547].

Mizrachi alludes to to the music of eastern Jews, from the eastern Mediterranean eastward into Israel, Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, and as far as India. In song, the main language used is Hebrew, although local languages have also been used, most notably Arabic.

Denburg suggests that lumping Sephardi and Mizrachi together to refer to any non-Ashkenazi music is a mistake. "The Mizrachi element is much more involved with non-western modes, instruments and forms of expression; it also has no inherent connection with Ladino. The Sephardi tradition is somewhat of a bridge between the Mizrachi and the Ashkenazi – it has some connection with both eastern and western forms of musical expression, as one might expect from a culture sprung up on the shores of the Mediterranean."

Incidentally, Denburg himself is a member of a Vancouver-based musical group with the wonderful name of Tzimmes. You can sample Tzimmes on-line [http://www2.portal.ca/~jsiegel/ discs.html].

Continuing on this food-and-Sephardi-music theme, Shakshuka is the name of a trio of Chicago-based musicians who love Jewish music and grew up influenced by the jazz, rock and soul music of their youth [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Shakshuka/]. Shakshuka presents Israeli and Sephardi songs in Hebrew and Ladino with an updated twist. Elements of jazz, rock and soul are added to their arrangements. You can listen on-line to hear how all those influences synthesize to form a new style of music in a song like Eit Dodim (A Time For Love). As a bonus, the band's Web site even has a recipe for the other kind of Shakshuka, eggs in a spicy tomato sauce.

Speaking of spices, Za'atar is a herb mixture composed of savory, thyme, sumac and sesame seeds. It is also the name of a Berkeley-based band dedicated to the performance of the vibrant music of the Jewish Mizrachi and Sephardi cultures [http://www.nuc.berkeley.edu/students/scott/zaatar.html]. Unfortunately, there are no musical samples at this site.

Next week, we'll continue sampling Sephardi music. But if you just can't wait, the links at the SephardiConnection should keep you tapping and humming until next week [http://sephardiconnect.com/links-music.htm].

Digging deep reveals Jerusalem's Jewish past

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dan Bahat digs Jerusalem.

The Israeli archeologist and historian is busy excavating what he describes as "the most exciting archeological site in Israel."

For the past 13 years, he has directed excavations at the Western Wall tunnels, whose dusty remains and artifacts reveal the panoramic sweep of Jewish history in ancient Israel.

Bahat, a senior lecturer at Bar-Ilan University's Land of Israel Studies Department, has discovered the weathered walls of a Maccabean palace, the ruins of an aqueduct and a system of cisterns which supplied water for the local population.

The tunnel excavations are nowhere near completed, said Bahat in an interview prior to delivering a lecture on the topic for Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Two years ago in September, the tunnels made headlines around the world when the Israeli government opened one of them to the public. Palestinians rioted, thinking that the tunnel passed under the Dome of the Rock mosque.

Demonstrations spread to the West Bank, resulting in the deaths of 15 Israeli soldiers and some 70 Palestinian civilians and police officers from the Palestine Authority.

"No matter what we do in Jerusalem will be opposed by the Palestinians," said Bahat, who admits he was surprised by the outbreak of fighting. "Both sides – Israel and the Palestinians – are trying to improve their positions before final status talks on Jerusalem."

Earlier this year, Bahat, author of The Illustrated Atlas of Jerusalem, began work on the City of David in an attempt to shed further light on two legendary biblical figures, David and Solomon.

Dan Bahat

Archeologists pored over the City of David in the 1920s, but Bahat believes they were not thorough. "I hope to find places untouched by previous digs," he said.

David looms large in Bahat's imagination. About 30 years ago in Tel Dan, an excavation in northern Galilee, he stumbled upon an inscription directly relating to David.

Bahat, a Hebrew University graduate and a specialist in the medieval history of Palestine, said that archeologists still have much to uncover in Jerusalem.

Mt. Zion, an integral part of the city during antiquity, is but one example. Bahat thinks that Mt Zion was an exclusive neighborhood dotted with the villas of rich merchants.

He also believes that the area around the Temple Mount contains an archeological treasure trove.

According to Bahat, the nature of archeology in Jerusalem has changed since the 1967 Six Day War.

Until then, Israeli archeologists were mainly interested in Jerusalem's Jewish historical dimensions, namely the first (1000 BCE to 586 BCE) and second (167 BCE to 70 CE) Temple periods.

But since 1967, they have broadened their horizons and investigated Christian and Muslim sites.

Six years ago, Bahat himself came upon the foundations of a Crusader church adjacent to the Temple Mount.

Meanwhile, colleagues have unearthed major Muslim structures, most notably Omayad palaces south of the Temple Mount.

In his view, archeologists already have found the most important Muslim archeological sites within Jerusalem's municipal boundaries.

To the best of his knowledge, Palestinian archeologists have not applied for excavation permits because they do not recognize Israel's authority in Jerusalem.

The Antiquities Authority, he claimed, would " not hesitate" to grant such permits.

Bahat, a field director of the famous Masada dig, said he has never had a negative experience with Haredim trying to block an excavation.

"I found a path to their hearts. When you talk, you don't shoot."

In closing, Bahat said he is in need of volunteers and financial support from contributors abroad. Volunteers must be at least 16 years old and should be able to pay for their passage to Israel and their expenses there.

Every Jewish child is our child

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we near the end of the Jewish year, we read the last chapters of the book of Deuteronomy. Moses, knowing his final days are approaching, tries to emphasize the importance of learning, safeguarding and remembering God's messages.

One of Moses' statements is included in the Shema, but we are so accustomed to it that perhaps its meaning has been dulled: "And you shall teach them to your children and you shall speak of them." Why is the word "you" rendered in the plural form? Would it not be more appropriate to speak to the individual when addressing the personal relationship of parent and child?

Jewish law teaches that we are all responsible for the education of our children. If particular parents are negligent in this regard, it ultimately becomes the community's responsibility. No Jewish child should be without an understanding of the values and ethics of Judaism. Yet there are also philosophical implications to the plural form of "you."

If you educate your child in the morals and values of Judaism and send that child to a Jewish school, is that not sufficient? If the community has set up a scholarship fund to ensure that all Jewish children can attend Jewish schools, is that not sufficient?

The answer is no. Imagine that your child, properly raised with Jewish values, now attends a Jewish school with other children whose parents have not instilled the same values. Many times parents are confronted with stories of their children's classmates behaving in ways clearly not reflective of Jewish morals.

Increasingly, schools feel hesitant to intrude into the social or extra-curricular lives of their students. Should the parent speak to the other children? Is it proper to discipline another person's child? Should the parent speak to the other parents? Is it better to allow your child to sort it out, hoping it will build character? These are all difficult questions and of course it is dangerous to generalize. Yet, the Torah speaks to this issue.

By using the plural form of the word "you," Moses, our greatest Torah teacher, has conveyed an important lesson. If we do not all strive together to instil the same values into our children, we have weakened ourselves internally. It is not sufficient to see that a desk is provided in a classroom. A Jewish education must involve both books and real life issues.

For example, we are all aware that a milestone in a Jewish child's life is their bar/bat mitzvah. If we know that a celebration is being held and every child was invited except one, or two, or three, perhaps a phone call should be made. It does not have to be your child that is excluded in order to justify placing the call. If we hear a child is being teased, perhaps a phone call should be made. It need not be specifically your child. "You (plural) shall teach it to your children..." We (plural) are all Jewish parents and every Jewish child is our child.

O Amore Natural הוא סרט ברזילאי שונה מכל דבר שראיתי עד כה. אני מקווה שעד שיופיע הטור הזה- הוא עדיין יהיה על האקרנים. לפני לא מעט שנים נפטר בשיבה טובה בברזיל המשורר המכובד ונשוא הפנים דרומונד. והינה, מספר שנים אחרי מותו התפרסם, לא עלינו, ספר של שירים אירוטיים מקסימים של המשורר, אבל אירוטיים לא כמו חיים נחמן ביאליק ("הכניסיני תחת כנפך"), אלא בדיבור ישיר בלי לפסוח על פרטים. מה שהסרט הקטן והמקסים הזה עושה- הוא נותן לברזילאים לגלות מחדש את המשורר שלהם. והם עושים זאת בשקיקה ובאהבה. סך הכל שמו מצלמה והנציחו נשים וגברים ברזילאים בשנות השבעים והשמונים לחייהם קוראים שירים אירוטיים של דרומונד ומספרים בצורה טבעית ומקסימה מה השירים האלה מזכירים להם. ממרומי גיל שבעים שמונים אין כבר כל-כך הרבה בושות, וכל דבר נראה כמו זיכרון טוב משנים שעברו. בחיים לא ראיתי סרט באורך מלא שהצליח להעביר שירה בצורה כל כך נפלאה. כל חמש דקות הקהל מתגלגל מצחוק כשזקנה בת שמונים מתארת את נפלאות האהבה הגופנית מלפני חמישים וששים שנה, את התשוקה, הסערה, התערבלות החושים וכל חילופי החמרים שמלווים אותם. זה לא סרט לכל אחד, אבל אם אתם אוהבים שירה, ואוהבים אהבה, ואוהבים את החיים- אולי תהנו מהזווית המיוחדת של הסרט הזה. ופורטוגזית- איזו שפה מדליקה. רק להקשיב ולתת לנשמה לשיר. שמונה בסולם קורן.

Kideckel society winds down

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Toronto's Kideckel clan, it's the end of an era.

While the family soldiers on ever-growing, the beloved club begun by its patriarch and his children 47 years ago is folding – the victim of youthful indifference.

The Kideckel Social and Benevolent Society was founded in 1951 by Israel Kideckel, his nine children and their children after a cousin fell ill, at a time when there was no provincial coverage.

The inaugural meeting, held according to meticulous records, at 127 Lippincott St. in Toronto, took up a collection for the sick relative and planned a social event or two.

From there, a bona fide constitution was written, officers were elected, regular meetings held, and programs planned. It was a kind of landsmanschaft, but for a single, albeit large, family. Membership was limited to the direct descendants of Israel Kideckel and his wife Minnie. Dues then were $1 per person, per month.

Over the years, the Kideckel Club planned family parties and outings, kept up on family business, held garage sales, and members estimate, doled out some $200,000 to three major Jewish charities: Jewish National Fund, United Jewish Appeal and Baycrest.

Sadly, the club is now folding. "The younger generation just doesn't want it," rues 81-year-old Wilfred Kideckel, the son of Israel and one of the last founders.

Another reason the club is ending is that over the past three years, six family members have died, including four of Israel Kideckel's children. The sole originals left are Wilfred and his 88-year-old brother Harry, who lives at Sunnybrook Hospital.

Wilfred estimates that of the 148 descendants of his parents, fewer than a dozen are still interested in maintaining the society.

The decision to wrap things up "was the saddest day of my life," remarks Nelson Ludwig, 70, a grandson of Israel Kideckel and the society's last president.

Israel Kideckel, his wife Minnie and their two children came from Latvia in 1906, lured by free farmland in northern Ontario. They settled in the Jewish farming community of Krugersdorf. Israel also helped lay track for Ontario's northern railway.

In 1917, the growing clan shifted to Ansonville (now Iroquois Falls, near Timmins) and opened a grocery store. The family, now with nine children, moved to Toronto in the 1940s. Minnie died in 1946, Israel in 1953.

And the club's charter, drawn up by a lawyer, was the real deal.

"We met the last Sunday of every month. The rule was, if you missed three meetings, you were out," says secretary/treasurer Goldie Weinstein, 71, Ludwig's sister. There was also no smoking and no gum chewing. Detailed minutes were taken.

Stiff fines were meted out too. "If you spoke out of turn, you were fined ten cents, or three for a quarter," Weinstein laughs. Judging by The CJN interview with the club's last members, the fine collector was probably the busiest person in the room.

Over the years, surnames associated with the club have included Moriens, Shapiro, Kravitz and Weinstein.

But now, Israel Kideckel's great- and even great-great-grandchildren are fanned out across North America and Israel.

"We'd gather to fight," chuckles Wilfred, amid the din. "But the club held the family together."

Artists & Creativity

What inspires creativity in the artist? Is it an accumulation of experiences or does creativity flow from a single, watershed experience? Ibn Ezra, the great medieval philosopher believed that the poet and the artist create by nature, not because of what they acquired through learning. This is the second article in a series of sketches on Artists & Creativity that will explore such questions.

By BILL GLADSTONE

House-keys are a recurrent symbol in Promise of Shelter, a recent collection of stories by Montreal writer Robyn Sarah – the very title of which, she says, refers to what a key symbolizes.

In one story, Shelter, a woman loses her keys during a late-night dash to the neighborhood grocery store and recalls an eerie dream about getting lost as she shivers in the snow. In another, Janine, an insomniac man goes downstairs one night to find a local street-person making a sandwich in his kitchen – a woman who, when challenged, shows him the key she claims he had once given her.

Both stories seem slightly ominous, dreamlike and surreal, hinting at a multitude of bad things that lurk at the edges of our lives, ready to threaten and thwart us in a heartbeat. Numerous stories by Sarah seem to contain these weird, unsuspected elements that might easily upset our precarious existences without notice.

Where do Sarah's creative ideas come from? The poet, fiction writer, essayist and journalist explains that she does not choose the subjects she writes about but that they choose her.

"By the time I start to write something, the germ of it has been knocking around in my head for a long time, sometimes years," she says. "I write about things that bother or puzzle me, things that won't leave me alone or I can't get out of my head. It can be something I saw in passing or something someone told me about or something overheard in conversation. But it's something that sticks in my head and won't go away."

Only when she puts a thing down on paper does it begin to loosen its hold over her, she says. "After I write about it, it's in a form that I can manage. It's not something that keeps me awake at night any more."

Sarah says she often feels a compulsion to write. "In one of my poems there's a line that goes, 'Sometimes, it's good to speak not because you have something to say but because you have to say something.' It's a poem about the creative process."

When she has "something to say," she turns to journalism, producing a newspaper article for a publication like the Globe and Mail, and usually knowing in advance what shape the piece will take. For fiction and poetry, however, the creative process is markedly different.

"Journalism comes more from the intellect. The impulse to write a story or poem is an emotional impulse, and I don't know what I have to say until I've said it. It doesn't seem to me to be a deliberate or conscious process. That's probably why from the time something first starts nagging me until I write about it can be very long. I think a lot of the work gets done subconsciously."

To compose journalistic articles, Sarah usually works with a computer. When composing fiction and poetry, she prefers the slower, more thoughtful process of writing first in long-hand and then transferring to a manual typewriter for rounds of careful revisions. How the work gets completed" is a very mysterious process that is never the same – it doesn't follow a pattern.

"When I start a story I don't know if I'm going to finish it. Once I've got past the first few pages there's a good chance I'm going to finish it. But it's not like I've got the story in my head. I've usually got a central image or a character but I don't really know where it's going. Often, even when I know how it's going to end, I don't know how I'm going to get there."

Like many serious writers, Sarah keeps unfinished works in a drawer. Revisiting them months or years later, she sometimes find stray pieces that fit together "like molecules bonding" and grow into new poems or stories. She says it's important for writers to cultivate the habit "of being receptive to messages" and not to get too fussy about their environment or the conditions under which they can create.

She finds inspiration wherever she happens to be, she says. "Did you ever notice the words printed on a box of wooden matches? It says, 'Strike Anywhere.' One should cultivate the qualities of a wooden match.

"There are people who say 'I've got to go to Italy to be inspired,' but not me. I can look out the same window that I look out of every day and find something to write about if I'm looking in the right way. It comes from within: it's a way of being open, a way of paying attention."

Sarah's latest work is Questions About the Stars, a volume of poetry published this month by Brick Books.

Research chair honors lawyer

TORONTO — Friends and partners of lawyer Eddie Goodman have joined together to establish a research chair at the University of Toronto (U of T) to honor the 50th anniversary of Goodman's call to the bar.

The partners of Goodman Phillips & Vineberg (formerly Goodman & Goodman), and Lionel and Carol Schipper have committed $1 million to establish the Goodman-Schipper Chair in the university's Faculty of Law. The donation is being matched by U of T to endow the chair in perpetuity.

"Together, Goodman Phillips & Vineberg, and the Schippers have made a wonderful commitment to legal education in Canada," says Ron Daniels, dean of the faculty. "The chair allows the faculty maximum flexibility in supporting its academic mission by enabling us to support the research and teaching of a distinguished law scholar, and providing us with an opportunity to recruit a junior faculty member who is just beginning an academic career."

Goodman received his BA in law from U of T in 1940 and is a senior partner at Goodman Phillips & Vineberg. Following his call to the bar in 1947, he joined his father David Goodman to form Goodman & Goodman. Under his leadership the Goodman firm became one of Canada's leading law firms. In 1995 it joined forces with Phillips & Vineberg.

"The foundation I received from my years at the U of T has been of great value throughout my law career," says Eddie Goodman. "I've always believed it's important to give something back to the community. It was a wonderful surprise to be honored by my colleagues and partners with this endowment. And it's an honor to be associated with two good friends, Lionel and Carol Schipper."

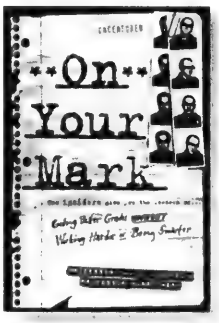
On Your Mark can help your marks

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter



TORONTO — If you're savvy enough to get into university, you can probably deduce that calling your professor after midnight to explain why your essay is late won't earn you any Brownie points.

But you might be unaware that most profs have a favorite side of the classroom, and that strategic seating could prove beneficial to your final grades.

At least, that's one of the tips to be found in On Your Mark, a 152-page paperback subtitled Getting Better Grades Without Working Harder or Being Smarter.

Thirtysomething authors David Kinahan and Harry Heft wrote the slim guidebook, published last year by Macmillan Canada, based on their combined teaching experience of 15 years at the University of Western Ontario, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, King's College and McMaster University.

The point, according to Kinahan and Heft, is to make a good impression – and to do so subtly. Subjects they address include the fine art of asking questions, and how to finesse unexpected encounters outside of the classroom.

"If the professor thinks you're a jerk, the professor will prove this to herself through evaluation of your work," they write.

It's not exactly a sophisticated intellectual theory, but the writers – whose style is refreshingly breezy for a couple of academics – argue that a student who takes their advice can turn a B into an A.

If you want to cover all your bases and – who knows? – maybe turn that 78 into an 80, it'll set you back $16.95. It just might pay off to do some extracurricular reading.

Israel at 50 Pavilion — From Sand to Cyberspace

As part of the exhibit's overarching theme, From Sand to Cyberspace, visitors can take a desert camel ride and learn about past and present strategies to reclaim land – particularly in the Negev – once regarded as permanently arid desert.

Visitors can also enjoy the Echoes of the Past – Visions of the Future art gallery, featuring original artwork about Israel by Canadian and Israeli artists.

In addition, they can tour a mock-up of a kibbutz or take in live performances by Israeli singing troupes, dancers, choirs and musicians, as well as fashion shows and food demonstrations, on a 500-seat Jerusalem-themed central amphitheatre stage.

The pavilion will have a circular layout, "the centre of which is Jerusalem, just like in Israel. Everything revolves around Jerusalem."

Among those performing both familiar and original Hebrew and English songs will be the touring Israeli sextet Yovel Israel at 60.

Visitors can sample a range of Jewish and Israeli foods from two restaurants, one of which is kosher under COR and will be closed on Shabbat along with some booths, something "unheard of" for the CNE, which generally requires all booths to be open during fair hours, says Morton. The second restaurant is not kosher because the CNE insists that food be available on Saturday, she explains.

Shopping for clothing, arts and crafts, books, music and software with Israeli or Jewish themes will be available in two shopping areas – a cardo "for the upscale stuff" and a shuk for some authentic Middle Eastern flavor.

Children ages three to 11 can visit the Los Angeles-based travelling exhibit My Jewish Discovery Place: A Children's Museum, focussing on Jewish history, customs and values through interactive exhibits like tying the tzitzit on a tallit. Parts of the exhibit will find a permanent home at the Bathurst Jewish Centre after the Exhibition.

The pavilion will be open for the CNE's duration from Aug. 21 to Sept. 7.

At a recent Unity Day program held at Camp Ramah, campers from six Jewish summer camps gathered in small groups (part of one is seen, above) to share their views about Israel.

Kids camps promote unity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UTTERSON, ONT. — Six Jewish overnight camps did their bit to promote Jewish unity at a program hosted in early July by Camp Ramah.

The Utterson, Ont. camp, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, hosted delegates from Camps Moshava (Bnei Akiva), Shomria (Hashomer Hatzair), Solelim (Young Judaea), Northland-B'nai Brith and Gesher (Habonim Dror) for Unity Day.

The idea, to mark Israel's 50th anniversary and take a stand against community divisiveness, was the brainchild of Ramah's director, Rabbi Mitch Cohen, who suggested it during a winter meeting of Ontario Jewish camp directors.

Four hundred and fifty participating campers, all age 14 or 15, broke into groups to discuss what they see as the most significant event in Israel's history, and why Israel is important to North American Jewry. The day culminated with an Israeli song and dance festival prepared by the campers.

"Our kids enjoyed it," said Ellen Nash, director of Camp Northland-B'nai Brith in Haliburton, which sent the largest contingent, about 100 campers. "They were made a little more aware of the diversity of types of camps [that are] all Jewish and all have different perspectives. I think it was valuable."

David Moscovitch, educational director of Camp Gesher, located in Cloyne, felt that while the idea was good, the implementation could have been more successful. Of the groups he observed, the discussions fizzled and the campers "weren't into it."

The way Aaron Greenberg, head counsellor at Moshava – and an organizer of the program – saw it, the day was "very positive." For campers at the Orthodox camp, he said, it was interesting to meet their peers from different Jewish backgrounds. They found common ground in the use of Hebrew at Ramah and Moshava, as well as in their mutual interest in Israel – not to mention the Toronto Blue Jays.

Interest in the discussion topics "varied tremendously" and some discussions were abandoned, admitted Rabbi Cohen. He feels the day was a success, however, and said there is talk of it becoming an annual event. "Personally, I think it's a statement that the Jewish community can work together."

For Rabbi Cohen, the highlight of the day was the song and dance festival. When all the participants joined together in the singing of Hatikvah, it was "very powerful."

One camper said her prayer for Israel is that there will be unity between different sets of Jewish people and peace between Israel and surrounding countries.

"It was nice to see everyone coming together for this day for Israel," said Greenberg. "I think with all the conflict in the Jewish community, both here and in Israel, it's nice to see we're able to look past our differences and come together. I hope this will be a model for the future."

Labelling regulations 'oppressive', Quebec court told

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada's regulations on the labelling of imported foods are "oppressive" to the Jewish community because they have the effect of barring non-complying kosher products from the country, lawyer Paul Nadler argued in a Quebec Superior Court case challenging the constitutionality of the regulations' application to kosher food on the grounds that it violates freedom of religion.

Not having these products in Canada "will make it extremely difficult on the Jewish community to practise a tenet of its religion which is very central and essential," he wrote in his note and a constitutional exemption should be made.

His client, Les Importations Cacheres Hahamovitch Inc., is appealing a Quebec Court decision that found the company, one of the major kosher importers in Montreal, guilty on 10 counts under the federal Food and Drug Act (FDA) and fined it $850.

The issue is not language. Rather, the company was charged for bringing into the country cookies and crackers that did not comply with the regulations that require manufacturers' nutritional claims to meet Canadian standards.

Specifically, a brand of crackers whose label bore the claim "low sodium" actually contained a higher level of sodium than the Canadian maximum of 40 milligrams of sodium per 100 grams of food, and cookies that carried a claim of "low in saturated fat" and "no cholesterol" did not have on their nutritional panel a breakdown of the grams per serving of saturated, polyunsaturated and monosaturated fats, as required.

Both products were kosher for Passover. Although federal regulations requiring bilingualism are waived during the Passover period, there is no explicit exemption from compliance with nutritional norms when low-sodium or low-fat claims are made.

In his ruling, Quebec Court justice Bernard Grenier wrote: "I am of the opinion that the advantages, in terms of protection of the health of consumers and of their right to be well informed about their choice of food, far outweigh the disadvantages for those who would be prevented to buy the products involved in this case."

The absence of any exception in the FDA is "understandable because of the potential danger for public health in allowing food products to be sold when these products do not reveal adequate information about their compositional content."

He said the "goal of promoting public health and consumer protection has to be balanced against the effect the regulations have on a relatively limited number of people who, for religious reasons, choose to eat only certain types of food at Passover.

"The regulations do not hamper the practice of religion by all members of the Jewish faith. It relates to the capacity of certain people to buy a special category of cookies or snackers (sic)."

Grenier noted that the decision to make nutritional claims is "purely voluntary" and that the regulations apply only if the manufacturer prints them on the labels. He also said the decision not to produce in Canada the foods in this case is "purely economic" because of the small market.

In the appeal before Judge Pierre Pinard, Nadler argued that these kosher foods should be exempted because they are imported in very small quantities and are usually sold in special sections of supermarkets and only in areas where there is sufficient Jewish population, and are not likely to be bought by the general public.

Moreover, he said it is "impractical and uneconomic" to re-label the packages here. It would add to their cost, which is already 30 to 50 percent higher than non-kosher equivalents, and added on labels "deface" a product making it unsellable.

Nadler also argued that the FDA regulations exceed federal jurisdiction in the area of health, which is principally a provincial responsibility. Federal authority to impose criminal law is limited to legislating against "adulteration" or ensuring purity standards of foods, he said. "The Crown has implied there is a serious national emergency and the government is obliged to take action to prevent people from dropping dead of heart attacks [from eating the products in question]," Nadler quipped.

This case is analogous to one in 1980 case in which Labatt brewery won its case against federal regulations that stipulated beer could only be called "light" if it contained less than 2.5 percent alcohol, Nadler said.

He said it was "an exercise in red tape and big government" to require both a compositional standard and certain labeling. In the case of sodium, Canada's "low" 40 mg standard is out of sync with that of the United States, which is 100 mg or the international threshold of 120 mg per 100 g, he stressed.

As for fat content, he maintained the average consumer does not understand, or bother to read, the different types that must be listed. It may also not be that beneficial because the regulations do not require revealing trans-fatty acids content, which is considered to be detrimental to cardiovascular health, he pointed out.

Pinard, however, said the point is not whether Canada's standards are right, but rather whether the government has the authority to set a standard. "If it does, the rest follows."

Crown prosecutor Gilles Villeneuve argued that this case is not about freedom of religion, but "how much profit a manufacturer or importer makes." Nutritional claims on packages are intended to make the product more attractive to the consumer, and thereby generate sales, he said. "They have absolutely no obligation to make those claims."

The only thing preventing the sale of these products in Canada is their refusal, for economic reasons, to comply with Canadian regulations, he said.

The defence, he said, had not established a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it had not demonstrated that the extra costs of re-labelling was more than "trivial or insubstantial" or interfered with religious belief or practice. Unlike the Lord's Day Act, for example, the FDA regulations are "religiously, culturally and ethnically neutral," Villeneuve said.

He recalled that the defence's main witness, Hahamovitch owner Michael Zimlichman, had been unable to state precisely what the additional cost would be, having made no analyses.

JET studies Torah

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Adults were given a taste of serious Torah learning at a recent study week sponsored by JET (Jewish Education through Torah).

"To study every day for five days was much more effective than to study one day a week for five weeks," said Rabbi Zischa Shaps, founder of JET.

Although there are a number of programs providing continuing Jewish education in Ottawa, Rabbi Shaps says, "We feel that the source of Jewish education is the Torah," and JET's programming reflects this philosophy.

Throughout the week, classes and workshops on topics ranging from Learn to Read Hebrew, to Navi for Women, to Gemarah, were led by local instructors and visiting lecturers.

For the second year, Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum, a Toronto teacher, director of NAVON Educational Foundation and editor of Torah Facts, attracted a number of returning students, beginning with his lecture at the opening reception entitled Two Jews, Three Shuls: There's Nothing Like a Good Argument.

Rabbi Michael Skobac, consultant to the Toronto branch of Jews for Judaism, gave a special three-day counter-missionary survival seminar, in addition to leading a daily Mitzvah a Day class.

Evening lectures were held throughout the week, which concluded with a Shabbaton at Machzikei Hadas Synagogue.

"The program attracted people from a wide range of backgrounds, all ages, many levels of knowledge, education and observance," said Rabbi Shaps.

JET holds adult education programs in Ottawa throughout the year and plans to hold a third adult Torah study week next summer.

Life begins at 80: retirement expert

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Within the next 10 years a significant number of women and men will live to between 100 and 150 years of age, a Toronto expert on retirement predicted recently.

Gene therapy, or the ability to change human cells, will overcome cancer, Alzheimer disease and other ills, Michael Sossin told the Association of Jewish Seniors at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Sossin, 86, operated the Blackstone Hotel, a retirement home in Miami Beach, Fla., for many years. A native of Toronto and at one time the owner of a large car dealership in Oshawa, he recently moved back to Toronto.

Basing his remarks on 50 years of housing and caring for thousands of retired people, Sossin said the primary need for "marginal" cases of Alzheimer disease is "tender, loving care."

There is medication now available which changes the whole picture of treating disorders of the mind, he pointed out.

But most problems with health start with what people eat, he said, advocating a balanced diet.

"I know so many people who can tell me what happened 15 or 20 years ago and can't say what happened five minutes ago."

One of the prescriptions he offered was: "You can't do anything on your own and without love, you can't do anything."

The three plagues which afflict elderly people are loneliness, boredom and helplessness, he said.

His own philosophy is reflected in the slogan, "life begins at 80," he said, but the quality of years lived is more important than the quantity.

His operating credo at the Blackstone was "to let people do what they wanted," and there were many engagements and weddings among retired people when he was there.

Sossin campaigned for a system of medicare in the United States similar to that in Canada while active in the retirement residence business there.

Examples he gave of interesting people who were residents of the Blackstone included a 94-year-old man worth half a million dollars who couldn't sign his own name, and a woman who had a stroke but lived there happily for 30 years.

Labor may expel Orr

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor party leader Ehud Barak was expected to expel MK Ori Orr from the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, the faction executive, and Labor's leadership team, following his derogatory remarks about Sephardim in an interview with Ha'aretz.

Orr reportedly suggested to the Labor faction that he suspended himself from the faction, but no further details were available on what this meant.

There was mounting pressure on Barak to do something decisive to force Orr's resignation from the Knesset, or at the very least, from all his party positions.

MK Shlomo Ben-Ami told Orr at the meeting that for the good of democracy and Labor's future, he must suspend himself from all political activity.

A number of MKs are demanding to put to a vote the proposal that Orr resign.

Last week, Orr met Barak and the two discussed the possibility of Orr's suspending himself from all his party and Knesset duties.

As a growing number of Laborites pressed for Orr's resignation, Orr asked to convene the faction so that his colleagues hear him out before deciding on the matter.

"Someone manipulated what I said in an ugly way. To my regret, a large group of people was hurt," Orr said before the faction meeting.

Among those demanding Orr's resignation are MKs Haim Ramon, Shlomo Ben-Ami, Haggai Merom, Uzi Baram, and Avraham Shohat.

They criticized Barak for failing to "assume leadership" and take immediate steps to remove Orr from the party, and accused him of "deliberate delay" in handling the matter. They said Barak was wrong if he thought the damage Orr caused would blow over and insisted it was necessary to clearly disassociate Labor from Orr's statements.

They also pointed out that a suspension is insignificant when the Knesset is on recess for three months.

"The incident cannot be closed without taking steps first and foremost against the one who laid this explosive," Merom said. "Barak says he doesn't act like a guillotine [against Orr]. But the guillotine is not laid on Orr's neck, but on Barak's and Labor's."

Iranian missiles worry Israel

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Iran, which recently test-fired a missile with a range of 1,300 kilometres, is rapidly developing a more sophisticated weapon with a range of more than 2,000 kilometres and capable of carrying nonconventional warheads, military sources said.

The new missile is called Shihab-4 and its development could be completed within the next two to five years, the sources said.

Unlike the Shihab-3, test-fired last week, which is based on the North Korean No-Dong missile, the Shihab-4 is entirely a product of Russian missile technology and can carry biological, chemical or nuclear warheads.

"This is the great danger to us," a senior source said. "This will be more dangerous than the Shihab-3."

Iranian Defence Minister Ali Shamkhani said that the Shihab-3 "is absolutely domestically produced and has no assistance from any foreign country."

The military sources said the Shihab-4, which western intelligence assesses is based on the Soviet SS-4 missile, will contain all of the advanced technology and sub-systems that the Iranians will not include in Shihab-3.

Shihab-3, which the sources said will be operational in 1999, has been developed by Russia in a fast-track program that might not include nonconventional warhead capability.

"The Shihab-3 is being rushed," the source said. "They are so eager to complete this missile that they are shortening stages of development."

But the Shihab-4, the sources said, is being developed parallel to Shihab-3 and has made significant progress this year.

That assessment matches that of the Clinton administration. Earlier this week, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Martin Indyk warned that Shihab-4 would take from two to five years to complete and could reach much of Europe.

Israeli military sources said that, despite its pledges, the Russian government is not significantly slowing down the pace of missile technology transfer to Iran. Earlier this month, Moscow announced it would investigate nine companies for allegedly transferring missile technology to Iran.

The sources said Israel has been feeding Moscow intelligence on the involvement of both private and government-aligned companies in the Shihab-3 program. They said Russian defence and intelligence officials have listened, pledged to halt any such transfer, but have done little.

One such example, they said, came during the visit of a delegation headed by then-head of Russian domestic intelligence, Lt.-Gen Nikolai Kovalyov, who was recently dismissed by Russian President Boris Yeltsin.

The sources said the meetings were friendly, but the Russian officials consistently denied that leading Russian companies were supplying help to Iran. They said the denials continued even as Moscow announced an investigation of the very same companies.

"They declare their readiness to cooperate," a source said, referring to the Russian government, "but they are not cooperating."

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai's spokesman Avi Benayahu, said that there is no doubt Russia could prevent its companies from selling missile and non-conventional weapons technology to Iran, and Israel expects Moscow to do so.

The Shihab-3 could reach targets in Israel, Saudi Arabia, much of Turkey and portions of Russia.

Iran's defence minister suggested in a commentary in the Persian-language newspaper Iran that the test was directed at Israel rather than Teheran's immediate neighbors.

Sculpture desecrated

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The recent desecration of a sculpture at Buchenwald comes amid a backdrop of increased attacks on concentration camps in Germany.

Unknown assailants damaged the figure of a child by partially sawing through one of its legs. The child represents the 9,000 children who survived Buchenwald. An estimated total of 56,000 people died at the camp, including about 11,000 Jewish victims. The damage to the sculpture, which is located in a different section of the grounds than the main exhibition, was discovered by visitors to the site.

The sculpture of 11 figures by artist Fritz Cremer, erected in 1958, depicts a group of liberated survivors of Buchenwald.

In a statement, memorial site director Volkhard Knigge said the attack was an attempt to damage and even obliterate the memory of the suffering of Nazi victims.

State authorities said they suspected right-wing extremists were responsible for the attack.

There have been repeated incidents of young right-wing extremists scrawling graffiti or flashing the Hitler salute at Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen, both of which are in the eastern part of Germany. In the early 1990s, one of the former prisoner barracks at Sachsenhausen burned down in an arson attack by right-wing radicals.

But this is the first time that a memorial for former Nazi prisoners has been damaged, according to Rikola-Gunner Luettgenau, the deputy director of the Buchenwald memorial site.

Earlier this month, police in the state of Brandenburg were asked to stop reporting incidents of right-wing graffiti at concentration camp memorials to the media. Authorities at the memorial fear publicity about such incidents has inspired similar acts in the past. In the past 18 months, at least 12 such acts have been reported at the memorial sites at Sachsenhausen and Ravensbruck.

Incidents attributed to right-wing extremists jumped by more than a third in Germany last year, according to the federal government. There were 976 anti-Semitic acts reported to federal authorities last year, as compared to 846 in 1996. Most were related to propaganda crimes, although there were 40 desecrations of Jewish cemeteries.

Exercise in disappointment

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A year after U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright unveiled a more vigorous approach to Middle East peacemaking, she has nothing to show for her efforts.

The Oslo peace process she had hoped to rejuvenate remains irretrievably bogged down, with no realistic prospect of breaking the 16-month impasse any time soon.

Last week, at Albright's behest, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators, spearheaded by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Yasser Arafat's chief aide, Mahmoud Abbas, held a series of meetings to review her plan for a 13 percent Israeli redeployment from the West Bank.

But Israel and the Palestine Authority were unable to resolve their differences by the time the Knesset recessed for its three-month summer break, dashing hopes for the diplomatic breakthrough Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had been predicting.

At week's end, Israel's "10 plus three" offer had not changed. Israel was prepared to cede a further 10 percent of the West Bank, while converting an additional three percent into a "nature preserve" where the Palestinians would have no security control or the right to build. The Palestinians, who have accepted the American ideas for redeployment, spurned the proposal. Israel, meanwhile, presented its own demands, the most notable of which call on the Palestinians to complete the revocation of their national covenant and turn over suspected terrorists.

After being appointed secretary of state, she adopted a conspicuously low profile with respect to the Arab-Israeli peace process. But on Aug. 6, 1997, in her first major speech on the Middle East, she announced a shift in U.S. strategy.

She said she would press Israel and the Palestinians to accelerate their movement toward final status talks. Cognizant of three recent suicide bombings which had convulsed Israel, she urged the Palestinians to redouble their attempts to combat terrorism.

And in a reference to Israel's policy of building residential neighborhoods in disputed eastern Jerusalem (Har Choma) and expanding settlements in the territories, she asked Israel to forgo "unilateral acts which prejudge or predetermine issues reserved for permanent status negotiations."

Signalling her intention to become personally involved in the process, which broke down after Israel began construction of Har Choma, Albright made her first official trip to the Middle East in September. It was not a success, and Albright declared she would not return just to "tread water."

In the months to come, she met with Netanyahu and Arafat in Western European capitals. During the Iraqi crisis last winter, she conferred with Netanyahu in Jerusalem. These meetings were fruitless. She also dispatched Dennis Ross – the special Mideast envoy – to the region several times. But he, too, failed to close the gap.

Impatient with the slow and hesitant pace of the talks, Albright acknowledged that she was "sick and tired" of the situation. She pointedly advised Netanyahu and Arafat to show courage and make the required "difficult decisions."

In March, Israel officially rejected Washington's peace initiative, which turns on a phased Israeli withdrawal from 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for a Palestinian crackdown on terrorism.

Two months later, Albright held separate discussions with Netanyahu and Arafat in London. When they produced no results, President Bill Clinton invited the pair for a summit in Washington. Arafat said he would go. Netanyahu declined, prompting Albright to caution that a "crisis of confidence" had arisen between Israel and the Palestinians, and, in a warning to Netanyahu, that the United States might "reexamine" its role in the talks.

Since then, the impasse has deepened, leaving Albright high and dry and in no better a position than when she embarked on her difficult and perhaps impossible quest to reconcile Israeli and Palestinian national interests.

July 27

• A Palestinian family from the Gaza Strip donated organs from a son who died in a car accident to four Israeli Jews. "We thought of the donation as a purely humanitarian gesture," said the brother of the donor.

July 28

• During his visit to Lithuania last week, Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yisrael Lau asked the president of Lithuania, Valdas Adamkus, to turn over 300 Torah scrolls now in a Lithuanian library. Adamkus promised to discuss the matter with leaders of the Lithuanian Jewish community.

• Police recommended bringing indictments against 30 people associated with the right-wing pirate radio station Arutz-7. Police raided the station's offices last month to establish whether the station was operating from a ship outside the territorial boundaries of Israel, as it had claimed.

July 29

• The head of Palestinian security in the West Bank, Jibril Rajoub, called Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a "racist," adding that war with Israel was a possibility. "Hundreds from both sides will be killed," he said. "If Israel tries to enter our areas, battles will also happen in certain Israeli areas."

July 30

• Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani said he supports the idea of freeing some Palestinian prisoners as a goodwill gesture. Kahalani said he would release prisoners who did not have "blood on their hands." About 100 prisoners are being considered for release.

• After months of lobbying by Australian families, the Knesset established a parliamentary committee to investigate last year's Maccabiah bridge collapse. Chaired by Labor MK Micha Goldman, the bipartisan committee will begin its hearings next month.

• Ehud Barak and Netanyahu are running neck and neck, according to the latest public opinion poll conducted by the Dahaf Institute. Each gets 41 percent of the vote for prime minister. Ten percent of respondents would vote for neither. The maximum margin of error was 4.5 percent.

Ukrainian Jews surprise Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz

Faculty members from the St. Petersburg Jewish University lectured about Jewish culture and architecture in the area, which was first home to Jews in the 15th century.

The region's Jewish population is now less than 5,000.

Since most younger Ukrainian Jews have emigrated during the past decade, Jewish communities here are predominantly elderly.

Indeed, pensioners make up more than 60 percent of Jews in smaller Ukrainian communities. Most have found themselves in an extremely harsh economic climate as a result of the economic deterioration that has taken place since Ukraine became independent after the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991.

The Jews who live here are not religious. Few go to synagogue, even if there is one in their town. And even fewer know how to daven.

For example in Khmelnitski, whose Jewish population numbers more than 1,000, there are only three men in their 70s and 80s who know how to pray in Hebrew.

"It's never too late to start with what a small Jewish boy starts with," Rabbi Steinsaltz told those who gathered in a synagogue that was recently returned to the Jewish community.

"Even when a man is very limited in means, this does not excuse him from not being a Jew," he said, responding to the claim that the younger generation should lead the Jewish revival.

"I didn't expect that the rabbi would say such things," said a woman in her 70s after the lecture. She added that now she intends to light Shabbat candles in her home – something she has never done in her life.

Some of the sites the group visited are places whose memory still sears the Jewish consciousness.

Rabbi Steinsaltz had not previously visited the Jewish community in the town that bears the name of Bogdan Chmielnicki, who led the 1648 rebellion against Polish rule during which tens of thousands of Jews were killed.

Rabbi Steinsaltz still refers to the city as Proskurov – the original name of the town that was changed to Khmelnitski in the 1950s to honor the man who is still revered in Ukraine as a pioneer of the movement for national liberation.

But Rabbi Steinsaltz used the fact that the Jews rebuilt their lives here after the Chmielnicki massacre to provide an inspirational message.

"In percentage, that massacre was like the Holocaust. It was a disaster. But it was not the end of Jewish life here," he said.

Indeed, less than 100 years after that incident, this community's spiritual quest generated a new religious movement: Chassidism.

Rabbi Steinsaltz made stops in several towns and shtetls to visit the graves of some of the most revered chassidic leaders of the early generations.

Among them was the Ba'al Shem-Tov, also known as Besht, one of the founders of Chassidism, the populist, charismatic movement begun in the 18th century.

His grave inside a small acetic white-brick mausoleum stands in the middle of a nearly destroyed Jewish cemetery in the town of Medzibezh, where the Ba'al Shem-Tov spent his most creative years and where he died in 1760.

During the Nazi occupation of World War II, a German artillery battalion stood at the cemetery. Only a couple of dozen of graves survived, including those of the Ba'al Shem-Tov and some of his family.

Today, Medzibezh, a site of pilgrimage for chassidic Jews since the last century, has only one Jewish family.

A new synagogue for pilgrims – a very modest-looking building – is being built next to the cemetery with funds donated by a chassidic family from France.

Education debated

MK Shmuel Halpert (United Torah Judaism), who initiated the committee discussion, said the low rate of involvement in Jewish education explained the high assimilation rate.

"If this situation continues, we will in effect be lost. In another generation or two they won't even know they are Jewish," he said.

MK Naomi Chazan (Meretz) also said the government should be more active "or we will lose a large part of the Jewish people."

Binyamin Ish-Shalom, director of Beit Morasha, the Centre for Advanced Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, told the committee there is a drop in the motivation of Jewish communities abroad to support Jewish education.

"The distance between these communities and the state is widening and we are responsible," he said.

The director of Beit Hatefusoth, David Alexander, presented a survey which indicated that 37.4 percent of Israelis believe Diaspora relations today are weaker than they have been in the past, 17.6 percent believe they are stronger and 32 percent believe there has been no change.

More secular Jews are convinced the relationship has weakened (43.2 percent) compared to traditional Jews (33 percent) and religious Jews (31.4 percent).

Almost a third of those surveyed (31 percent) believe Israeli schools should teach about the Diaspora and Jewish schools abroad should learn about Israel. Just over 24 percent believe Israeli and Diaspora schools should adopt each other.

IDF squad ambushed

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah guerrillas recently ambushed an IDF squad on its way to firing practice in south Lebanon, killing one soldier and wounding five others, the army said.

Another IDF force counterattacked and pursued the Shi'ite gunmen until they set off a roadside charge. No IDF soldiers were hurt in the explosion, but the Hezbollah guerrillas escaped, apparently unharmed, military sources said.

The soldier killed was identified as Staff-Sgt. Shahar Mins, 21, from Kfar Ahim. His death brought to nine the number of IDF soldiers killed in Lebanon so far this year.

The other soldiers all suffered light wounds.

Summer drinks that are cool

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

You know how your mother is always telling you to have healthy drinks during the summer, with not too much sugar and other stuff that isn't good for you? Those kind of drinks taste terrific and they are usually easy for kids to make themselves.

Eileen Goltz, who lives in Fort Wayne, Indiana, has sent us these recipes for cool summer drinks that are delicious and refreshing, and easy to make. And no one will tell you not to drink them. You might like to ask one of your parents to supervise you when you use the blender.

LEMON/LIMEADE

2 or 3 ice cubes
1½ tbsp. lemon juice (fresh is best)
1½ tbsp. lime juice (fresh is best)
2 tbsp. sugar
5 to 8 ice-cubes
2 cups cold water
Lemon slices

Pour the lemon and lime juice into a pitcher. Add the sugar and stir until it is dissolved. Add the ice-cubes and mix well. Garnish with lemon slices. Serves two. This can be doubled or tripled.

LEMONADE PLUS

2 tbsp. lemon juice (fresh is best)
1 tsp. sugar
1 cup chilled club soda
3 or 4 ice-cubes

In a large glass combine the lemon juice and sugar until sugar is dissolved. Add soda or water, and stir. Put ice-cubes in a tall glass and pour lemonade over them. Serves one. This can be doubled or tripled.

Instead of the sugar, you can use 1½ oz. raspberry or cherry syrup, half grape juice and half club soda, or chilled apple juice instead of club soda.

To make limeade, use lime juice instead of lemon juice.

FROZEN FRUIT SLUSH

1½ cups ice-cubes
1 ripe banana, sliced
5 strawberries, with the green part taken off
½ cups orange juice
1 cup pineapple chunks, drained

Mix all the ingredients in a blender and process until thick and smooth. Serve immediately. Serves two. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

A horse named Liberty

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When World War II ended in 1945, there were many, many Jews who had lost their homes and everything they had. They desperately wanted to come to America, to build a better life for themselves and their families.

(By the way, to most of them, "America" meant the United States. Canada, if they had heard very much about it at all, was not a place they thought about going, unless they had family here.)

The Hand-Me-Down Horse, by Marion Hess Pomeranc, with illustrations by Joanna Yardley (Albert Whitman & Co., Morton Grove, Ill., 1996) is a wonderful book about a little boy named David Solomon, who is waiting with his parents, his little brother Max, and his Aunt Rachel, for a place on a Liberty ship which would take them to America.

Aunt Rachel gives David pieces of paper with English words that he would need when he came to his new home – words like friend, baseball, and statue, "because Aunt Rachel said there was a beautiful statue waiting to welcome him to America." He hung them up on his wall, and practiced until he knew them by heart.

When his aunt left for America ahead of the rest of them, she gave him more words to learn, which he also put on his wall.

Days passed, and still the family didn't get to go to America. David got very discouraged, put all the words away in a box, and tried not to think about going to America.

Then something happened to cheer him up. Someone left him a rocking horse to play on. The only condition was that when he left, he had to give it to someone who was still waiting.

David was thrilled with the horse, which he named Liberty. Along with his friend, Martha, he made up all sorts of exciting stories and games to play.

You won't be surprised to know that the Solomon family eventually got to America – but what would David do with the horse?

The Hand-Me-Down Horse is a story you will really enjoy reading. You will also enjoy the pictures, which not only illustrate the story, but show the kind of clothes people wore then, the kind of places they lived, what kind of cars they drove, and what New York looked like.

TORONTO — A 26-year-old playwright believes there is enough interest in Jewish mysticism to attract an audience to The Kabbalistic Psychoanalysis of Adam R. Tzaddik.

Anton Piatigorsky, who has just moved to Toronto from the United States, examines the principles of Freudian analysis and the Zohar in his one-hour play, running for six performances at the Tarragon Theatre starting Aug. 6., as part of the Summer Works Festival.

Though Piatigorsky says he does not favor Freudian analysis over Kabbalah, he does concede he is interested in spreading knowledge about Jewish mysticism and believes even those who know little about Kabbalah will like the play.

The writer, who grew up in a non-observant household in Washington, D.C. and married Torontonian Ava Roth in April, took a degree in religious studies at Brown University in Providence, R.I., and followed it with studies in mysticism and modern Jewish thought at New York University. He then spent a year in Israel studying Hebrew and the theory of Halachah at an ulpan in Jerusalem.

The active and vibrant theatre scene in Toronto attracted him to Canada.

"When it comes to questions about life's meaning, is there really much difference between sacred and secular aspirations? Piatigorsky asks. "I am more interested in questions than answers."

His play dramatizes the clash between the scientific and the religious, the psychological and the mystical.

A second play by Piatigorsky, dealing with Jewish immigration in the North American west will open the first week in October at the Annex Theatre on Bathurst Street. It is titled Easy Lenny Lazman and the Great Western Ascension.

Among the 40 plays at the Summer Works Festival, which is also running at Factory Theatre, is a return of Blitzkrieg by Bryan Wade, a daring play of the '70s, examining the relationship between Eva Braun and history, with Michael Kessler as Adolf Hitler. It runs at Factory Theatre starting Aug. 8.

Blackout is a play that delves into the mysteries of technology and people's dependence on it. It is writen by five young female playwrights, including Kristen Schiener, who also directs. It is at the Tarragon.

Boris Brott reunites 'three tenors' for music fest

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — For those who missed Toronto's own cantorial three tenors at the Israel at 50 gala, or who want to hear them again, Boris Brott is bringing them back.

As part of the annual Boris Brott Summer Music Festival, local cantors Paul Kowarsky of Beth Tzedec Synagogue, Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple and Yaacov Motzen of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation will bring their considerable talents to the George Weston Recital Hall at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts on August 12 in a midsummer's Celebration of Israel's 50th.

The chazanim, representing the three main streams of Judaism, will reprise their May performance of the Israel at 50 Overture by Shaarei Shomayim musical director Steven Glass, as well as perform a pastiche program ranging from traditional cantorial melodies to Mendelssohn and Puccini and the work of Beth Tikvah music director and Order of Canada member Srul Irving Glick.

The tenors will be accompanied by Brott conducting the festival's National Academy Orchestra, half comprised of what Brott calls "the finest professionals from across the country" and half from "the finest young graduates" of Canadian university music schools.

Brott says his 11-year-old festival was established in the summer of 1988 as "a mentoring program akin to being a resident in a hospital or doing articles at a law firm" to help ease young musicians' transition from student to professional by playing with some of the country's finest musicians and concertmasters.

The internationally renowned guest conductor and corporate motivational speaker on teamwork and creativity certainly qualifies on both counts.

In addition to his 1969 to 1990 stint as music director of the now-defunct Hamilton Philharmonic, Brott has helped build five other Canadian orchestras, such as the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony and Symphony Nova Scotia, where he served as founder and artistic advisor from 1984 to 1989.

Boris Brott

Currently conductor and music director of California's New West Symphony and co-conductor of Montreal's McGill Chamber Orchestra, Brott was introduced to the "three marvelous tenors who happen to be chazanim" when he conducted the gala concert in May.

"I was so impressed with [the Israel at 50 concert]. It was such a wonderful event....so I thought wouldn't it be great to arrange a concert showing off their abilities as cantors and as legitimate operatic singers," he says.

As one of the Hamilton-based festival's two Toronto dates this year, Brott chose North York's Ford Centre "basically because the cantors are all known in Toronto and are all Toronto-based."

As well, the show could attract the city's larger Jewish community, give the festival "good exposure" and lead to more Toronto dates in future years, Brott says.

With only 1,100 seats in the recital hall, he expects the concert, sponsored by Hamilton women's clothier Milli, will be a sell out.

"It will be a fun, freiluch kind of evening showing off [the tenors'] talents," he says.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO— A year ago, Daniel Kerzner saw the Hot Shoe Shuffle in Australia and resolved to bring the multimillion dollar production to Canada.

Last month, the award-winning Australian tap-dance show made its Canadian debut at the Living Arts Centre (LAC) in Mississauga. Kerzner is the associate producer of the show which runs until Aug. 9.

"Coming up with this crazy idea to produce this multimillion show in Canada, and a year later to have done it, is an incredible feeling of satisfaction," Kerzner said. "This production has opened many possibilities for myself and LAC."

The accomplishment is even more impressive when one considers that Kerzner is only in his mid-20s. He was reluctant to give The CJN his exact age because, he said, people often associate age with experience.

But Kerzner has been in the entertainment field since the age of 16 and has amassed a substantive resume, beginning at Roots, where he helped with entertainment-related projects like store openings and parties.

While studying for a degree in communications at York University, he did an internship in marketing at MGM. "I have always loved marketing and communications – taking a product from the industry and marketing it to the consumer," he said.

When he was marketing director at the Atlantis Theatre at Ontario Place in 1996, Kerzner had the opportunity to become a producer. His first show, the off-Broadway hit Forbidden Hollywood, was followed by Neil Simon's Pulitzer-prize-winning play, Lost in Yonkers, directed by Al Waxman.

As producer, his responsibilities included casting , marketing and dealing with the day-to-day operations of the project, Kerzner ex-

Eye on Arts

IS ZORRO JEWISH?

John Gertz, a co-producer of the current feature film The Mask of Zorro starring Antonio Banderas and Anthony Hopkins, has some interesting theories about the masked, black-garbed swordsman who made his debut in a silent film in 1920.

"It's quite obvious Zorro is very Jewish," Gertz recently told a reporter for the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California. "His family has escaped to the far reaches of the Spanish empire in California. He is interested in matters of justice. He has a hidden identity. He is clearly a Marrano."

Book News: New York City-born Rabbi Martin Samuel Cohen, who lives with his family in Richmond, B.C. where he is the rabbi of the Beth Tikvah Congregation, has written several novels and collections of essays. His third and latest book of essays, Travels On The Road Not Taken: Towards a Bible-Based Theory of Jewish Spirituality, was published recently by Moonstone Press of London, Ont.

"There was also another way in antiquity, a way that offered its proponents a different kind of spiritual focus," Cohen writes in the preface. "It was a way of seeking God through direct experiential encounter, a method of spiritual enterprise rooted in the kind of faith that flows from sensual experience of the divine rather than the kind that develops from compliance to predetermined rules and regulations..."

New Album for Klezmatics: The renowned Jewish-roots band The Klezmatics have just finished recording The Well, a new album in collaboration with Israeli singer-songwriter Chava Alberstein. Toronto-based musician-producer Ben Mink, known for his work with k.d. lang, recorded the project at New York's Avatar Studios. The new album is scheduled for release in September.

Ford Centre Line-Up: Livent Inc. recently announced the fall-winter season for the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York. The 1998/99 season includes Annie, the popular tale of the feisty carrot-topped orphan (Sept. 8 to 20); Goosebumps Live On Stage, inspired by the popular American author R.L. Stine (Oct. 13 to 25); Smokey Joe's Cafe, the feel-good nostalgia hit from Broadway (Oct. 28 to Nov. 22); Barrymore, with Christopher Plummer portraying the legendary actor John Barrymore (Nov. 24 to Dec. 6); Cirque Ingenieux, about a young girl's dream of joining the circus (Jan. 5 to 24); and Peter Pan, starring Cathy Rigby (Jan. 29 to Feb. 21). Several ticket packages are available. 872-2222.

Berger is also scheduled to speak at a literary luncheon sponsored by Toronto ORT Arts & Entertainment chapter at the Island Yacht Club, Wed. Aug. 26.

Spanish Music at Earl Bales: Toronto flamenco company Ritmo Flamenco performs Aug. 6, 8 p.m. at the Skylight Theatre in the Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre of Earl Bales Park. At the same venue on Aug. 7, hear award-winning violinist Arkady Yanivker and friends perform more Spanish music.

An Evening with Lorca & De Falla, featuring mezzo soprano Odette Beaupre, pianist Ruth Morawetz and the Paula Moreno Spanish Dance Company, comes to Skylight Theatre Aug. 8 at 8 p.m. Free admission; suggested donation $5 per person. Box office, 392-3846.

Courtauld Collection: This stunning collection of 80 impressionist and post-impressionist paintings includes masterpieces by some of the biggest names in 19th- and early 20th-century art: Monet, Manet, Renoir, van Gogh, Degas, Cezanne, Seurat and Modigliani (who incidentally was Jewish). On loan from the Courtauld Institute of Art in London, these paintings are on view at the Art Gallery of Ontario through Sept. 20 in their only North American showing.

Despite the high ticket price of $28.75 (inclusive of taxes and service charge) and the sea of heads through which visitors must glimpse these extraordinary works, this reviewer was easily captivated by the celebrated canvases, which produced cultural shock waves in their time and which today seem so comfortingly familiar. If nothing else, the show teaches the importance of historical context in understanding a work of art. The taped guide ($5) is a must.

Journey of the mind

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Darren Aronofsky's eccentric film, Pi, takes a viewer on a bumpy journey of the mind, deep into the catacombs of higher mathematics, numerology, the Hebrew alphabet and Judaism.

Set in New York City in the present day, Pi revolves around the person of Max Cohen (Sean Gullette), a disheveled, misanthropic math genius whose quest for knowledge puts him on a collision course with a fanatic Chassidic sect.

The one-and-a-half-hour movie, shot in grainy black and white and with a hand-held camera, turns on Cohen's feverish attempts to find discernible patterns in stock market transactions so as to manipulate them for his own benefit.

As he toils over the daunting problem in his dark, roach-infested apartment, Max fights debilitating migraine headaches and fends off romantic, material and spiritual advances from three separate sources: an East Indian woman bearing samosas, a smooth-talking headhunter from a mysterious corporation, and a scruffy Chassid who thinks he can usher in the messianic age by finding a numerical pattern in the Torah.

Pi, now playing at the Cineplex Odeon chain, looks and sounds like a jerky experimental film. But don't be fooled by superficial appearances. Distinguished by a clever and literate script, Pi is full of breathless twists and turns which cry out for your undivided attention.

No wonder it was cited as the best-directed feature at the Sundance film festival last January

Aronofsky's preoccupation with the relationship between numerology, Hebrew and the destruction of the Second Temple is not only riveting but fairly original. Yet, for all of its inventiveness, Pi occasionally falters and irritates.

Clearly, however, Aronofsky is a young director with a future, as he so ably demonstrates in Pi, the scary and hallucinary flip side of a mainstream Hollywood film called Good Will Hunting.

Travel Talk

BY BILL GLADSTONE

WELCOME TO JEWISH LOS ANGELES

As the Canadian Airlines jet glides along its final approach to Los Angeles airport, the lights of this seemingly endless megalopolis sprawl to the horizon. Stretching 150 miles from end to end, the Greater Los Angeles area is longer than the state of Israel is wide.

Some 12 million people live in the greater metropolitan region, including as many as 600,000 Jews. Those demographics make Los Angeles the home of the third largest urban concentration of Jews in the world, after Tel Aviv and New York.

The first Jews passed through as trappers and traders in the 1820s, when Los Angeles was no more than a dusty pueblo in the Mexican territories. Many came along the Santa Fe trail. The first known Jew to settle here was Jacob Frankfurt, a tailor-adventurer, in 1841. It took another 10 years before the Jewish community was large enough to establish a cemetery and conduct a religious service (in 1851, in the front parlor of someone's home).

"The pioneer Jews had to know many languages and they were armed," says Stephen Sass, president of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern California. "They did not come here primarily to be Jewish."

Nonetheless there were so many Jewish merchants in the city by the mid-1850s and 1860s that on Yom Kippur, according to one contemporaneous account, it was "like a New England Sunday" in Los Angeles – all the shops were closed.

The first Jewish cemetery was in Chavez Ravine, just over the hill from Dodgers' Stadium. The community purchased the land for $1. Later the government bought it back and the remains of the deceased were removed (albeit not halachically) to the Home of Peace Cemetery. Over the decades, the Jewish community has also shifted from neighborhood to neighborhood in this continuously expanding city.

"The community is very mobile, it keeps moving around," says Sass. "That's why it's hard to get a sense of rootedness or cohesiveness in Jewish L.A. That's one of our problems."

From the 1920s through the 1950s, the Boyle Heights neighborhood was the local equivalent of New York's Lower East Side, teeming with thousands of Jewish immigrants and a wide variety of Jewish organizations. The area once boasted 30 synagogues and shtiebl-ach. Today only one active synagogue remains in Boyle Heights as the focal point for a greatly diminished community consisting of a few dozen octogenarians.

These days, the most visible focus of Jewish life is the busy Fairfax neighborhood, an urban island of Yiddishkeit of extraordinary diversity. Amidst the furniture and antique stores on Melrose Avenue are numerous yeshivot and Orthodox girls' schools, and various institutions of groups such as Lubavitch, Satmar, Young Israel and Aish HaTorah.

Fairfax offers a profusion of shops selling Jewish books, music, art, bagels and falafel; many cater specifically to Russian, Israeli or Persian Jews. (With about 30,000 Persian-Jewish inhabitants, L.A. has the world's largest community of ex-Persian Jews: signs in Farsi are common.) A multitude of kosher restaurants specialize in Chinese, Tex-Mex and other foods.

L.A.'s most prominent synagogue and the home of its oldest congregation is the Wilshire Boulevard Temple, which was once so fervently wedded to the principles of the classical Reform movement that congregants who insisted on wearing yarmulkes during religious services were required to leave.

Several L.A. congregations are mammoth. Sinai Temple is the oldest and largest Conservative synagogue west of Chicago. Tifereth Israel the largest Sephardic synagogue west of New York. Stephen S. Wise is a Reform temple that occupies a mountaintop complex overlooking Sherman Oaks; it is known locally as "the shul with the pool."

More about the the Jewish community of Los Angeles and its unique institutions in a future column.

Bill Gladstone flew to Los Angeles courtesy of Canadian Airlines and stayed in the Century Plaza Hotel in Century City.

Israelis develop yen for President's Choice products

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you walk into a Greenberg Super Shuk store in Israel, you'll feel an immediate pang of recognition when you spot a medley of familiar bags, bottles, jars, boxes and containers on the shelves.

Scanning the aisles, you'll notice a cornucopia of President's Choice (PC) products, all carrying Hebrew language stickers. They run the gamut from chocolate chip cookies and three-fruit marmalade jam to microwave popcorn and prepared Dijon mustard.

In fact, Greenberg – Israel's third largest supermarket chain and supposedly its fastest growing one – stocks 350 PC products, each and every one of them kosher.

Currently, 15 new health and beauty products – shampoo, shaving cream, baby powder and so on – are being developed. And by the end of this year, Greenberg, with 36 stores from Tel Aviv to Eilat, plans to introduce an additional 35 PC products, disclosed Ell Wilson, President's Choice International's senior manager for export operations.

PC products, which have been phenomenally successful in Canada since their debut in 1984, were launched in Israel two years ago. This happened after Greenberg's president, Giora Sarig, signed a licencing agreement with President's Choice International, a division of Loblaw Companies Limited, one of Canada's largest businesses.

On his visit here, Sarig was so impressed by the appearance, taste and value of PC products that he approached Loblaw and proposed what proved to be an irresistible deal.

"He liked the quality, design and performance of our products," recalled David Ovens, vice-president of President's Choice International, in an interview. "He thought they'd be well suited for his stores."

President's Choice, in turn, considered Sarig an ideal licencee. "We just won't sell to anyone," explained Ovens. "We want to align ourselves with the right partner, one who shares our philosophy."

President's Choice faith in Sarig has yielded dividends for both parties. "Our working relationship with Greenberg is tremendous," said Ovens. "We share the same goals and vision, where quality, value and cleanliness are the big components."

Sales have climbed steadily. In 1996, they hit the $2.5 million mark, and in 1997 they reached $3.5 million. This year, the figure is expected to be $5 million.

The sky seems to be the limit. "It's Greenberg's intention to be the number 1 grocery retailer in Israel," said Ovens.

Last year, Canada exported $242 million in goods and services to Israel and imported $312 million, creating a deficit of $70 million, according to Statistics Canada.

A Greenberg Super Shuk store features a President's Choice sign.

It's clear that Israeli consumers have developed a yen for PC's vast range of products, which are sold only in Israel in the Middle East.

One of its best sellers in Israel is PC ice cream. Sixty percent of the ice cream sold by Greenberg carries the PC brand. Greenberg stocks 13 flavors, but by Wilson's reckoning, customers are particularly fond of two flavors – Decadent Chocolate Fudge Crackle and Beyond Decadence Chocolate Fudge Crackle.

Although the majority of its products are manufactured in Canada, the ice cream is made in a plant in Dallas, Tex. Despite the Canada-Israel free trade accord, American ice cream remains cheaper. "The Canadian variety would cost 30 percent more," said Wilson, who has visited Israel three times on business.

PC cookies, cold breakfast cereals, ketchup (with its own bilingual label) and pet food are also enormously popular. "Our surveys tells us that our corn flakes is more popular than Kellogg's," Ovens added.

At present, there are no PC products carried exclusively in Israel. But this could change in the future, said Ovens. PC, however, is definitely interested in developing more kosher foods, both for the Israeli and Canadian markets. "It's a demand we'd want to satisfy," he said.

In general, Israelis pay more than Canadians for PC products largely because of the extra shipping charges. It takes about three weeks for a batch of goods to reach Israel by ship. "We don't use air freight," said Ovens. "It's too expensive."

Since the shelf life of PC products is one year, the long sea journey has no effect whatsoever on freshness.

Although PC products are also found in the United States (mostly east of the Mississippi River) and in Hong Kong, Bermuda, Barbados and Colombia, the company has no immediate plans to expand into other Middle Eastern countries.

"We've had conversations with retailers from the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon and Egypt," said Wilson. "For now, the Arab world is still on the back burner, but we don't rule it out. We're slowly developing our international market."

As far as Israel is concerned, it's full steam ahead.

"Our relationship with Greenberg is one of total cooperation," said Ovens. "We're very pleased to service them and satisfy Israeli consumers. This has led to mutual success."

The proof is in the pudding.

A cornucopia of PC products.

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

Alex Poch-Goldin's star is rising. Hard work and fate brought him to the attention of theatre audiences and critics during the run of This Hotel, the play he wrote for this year's Toronto Fringe Festival.

Recognized as a skilled actor, who has competently played diverse roles, including characters in Angels In America and The League of Nathans, he surprised alternative theatre aficionados with a full-scale, multi-character piece that showed respect for dramatic structure and theatre craft.

The production was a fine example of what can be accomplished when quality theatre artists work together to create a strong show. It also demonstrated Poch-Goldin's commitment to advancing his abilities. "I find a lot of [theatre] work in Toronto to be mediocre. I find that very frustrating. I want the level to rise," he declares during a lunchtime conversation.

This Hotel takes the audience into the fantasies and dreams cavorting inside the head of a fellow named Lester. Pulled in opposite directions by the twin horses Love and Lust, Lester (Randy Hughson), has become mired by confusion and anxiety. Frozen by his inability to decide what is important to him, he allows his marriage to crumble. Meanwhile, his wife Arlene (Gisele Rousseau), has chosen to refuel their relationship by taking a lover.

A black comedy, which toys with our notions about sexuality, voyeurism and betrayal, This Hotel shows what it means to squirm on the web of deception (of self and others). In fact, the play is replete with a spider in the form of the bellhop (Alon Nashman), who gleefully watches as unaware guests step into waiting traps.

The ensemble of actors, which included Veronika Hurnik and Richard Zeppieri, was a pleasure to watch. The choreography by Gizella Witkowsky and the original music by Brian Cram were admirable.

The power behind the show seemed to be director Kelly Thornton. Her conceptualization of the play made it exciting theatre.

Poch-Goldin began work on This Hotel several months ago, while between acting gigs. "I started writing a series of scenes about different characters in a hotel. My partner, director Kelly Thornton, began to realize we needed a central figure to take the audience on a journey." Slowly the play evolved, as it will continue to do, especially since it is likely that the piece will be picked up by a larger theatrical producer.

Poch-Goldin says he has been writing since elementary school. Born and raised in Montreal, one of his strongest images of home is sitting around the kitchen table at supper. "There was always lots of discussion, but never any easy answers... one of the things that helped me gain interest to look inside things."

He recalls too, "One of the first times I remember the excitement of being in front of a group of people and performing something for them was at my bar mitzvah." But, what really hooked Poch-Goldin on theatre, was the possibility of exploring the spectrum of one's personality by entering the worlds of alter egos.

He obtained his initial taste for acting in high school. Afterward, he studied drama at the Dome Theatre School in Montreal, followed by a brief, but intense program at the Eugene O'Neill Theatre School in Connecticut. He has been in Toronto for about 10 years during which he has established a good foothold in the theatre community.

This summer has been ripe for Poch-Goldin as an actor as well as a playwright. In the Skylight Theatre production of Pedro Calderon's Life's A Dream, he plays Clarion the clown, a role that lets him stretch in yet another direction. He sees Clarion as an endearing, melancholy, fatherless child, who has no sense of boundaries. "It [the role] opened a side of me that is a child, that likes being cute," he muses.

Poch-Goldin will move on to his Summerworks production, Jim and Shorty, which runs until Aug. 16 at the Factory Theatre. Though he wrote the piece at about the same time as This Hotel, the idea for the story was conceived on a street car ride six or seven years ago, during which he overheard two people discuss the closing of a local beer store. Out of that conversation grew a show about a couple of on-the-margins characters, tenuously linked by the tavern they both frequent. On election day, the lonely men happen to meet and become woven into each other's lives.

As the writer and director of this work, Poch-Goldin feels very close to the characters and to what the play says about living in a world that has been deemed peripheral by the establishment. Through Jim and Shorty, Poch-Goldin gets the opportunity to examine another variation on the existential questions that he finds exciting.

After this full season is over, Poch-Goldin may take some time away from his work, but he is also itching to further develop his plays as well as to try his hand at directing a classical piece. "I love the theatre," he admits happily. "It's never enough. It's fleeting. It's always gone when you've done it. There's something sad about that and I love that sadness. I have a melancholy soul that way."

Kerzner brings Shuffle to life

After he left Atlantis, Kerzner went on an extended holiday to Australia, making sure to see the hit show Hot Shoe Shuffle, which had run there for five years. He met with David Atkins, producer, director and star of the show at the time, and told him that he wanted to bring it to Canada.

"As a producer, you're constantly looking for the next big hit. Hot Shoe was such a huge success in other parts of the world I thought there had to be something there for Canadian audiences. It's very high-energy, innovative tap dancing complemented by a big band orchestra on stage and an original story.

"The audience went crazy over it. There were standing ovations throughout the show... The reaction we've had here has been the same. The audience loves it."

Back in Toronto, Kerzner was hired as press and publicity manager for the newly opened LAC, where he worked on a variety of projects but never lost his enthusiasm for Hot Shoe Shuffle, he said.

He was ultimately given the green light to pursue the project, and luck was in his favor, he said. The show was being mounted in the United States, making it financially feasible to produce it in Canada.

LAC was able to join an existing partnership for the Toronto production, gaining use of the costumes and multi-million dollar sets, he said, adding that the show will move on to Minneapolis.

"The show is about seven brothers performing on Broadway in the '40s... The ultimate hope of the show is to go to Broadway."

As associate producer, Kerzner was involved in liaising with the partners, negotiating contracts with the artists, holding auditions, and day-to-day operations.

"This is the largest production I've been involved, with... The sets are worth millions... There are over 30 members in the company. It's also the biggest show the LAC has done. It's been an incredibly exciting opportunity."

Ecklers were fixtures on the sporting scene

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With their silvery hair, cheerful lavender shirts and sunny demeanors, Harry and Shirley Eckler look the part of typical suburban seniors, sort of like a Jewish Ozzie and Harriet.

It's hard to imagine that 50 years ago, Harry's lifestyle would have more closely resembled a Humphrey Bogart character in a film noir classic. If there was a script for his story, it would be populated by tough guys, wise guys, hard drinkers and women of questionable virtue rather than clean cut neighbors, the corner grocer and the girl next door.

Fifty years ago, Harry was a partner in The Mercury Club, a popular 150-seat drinking establishment, er, make that nightclub on Victoria Street, along with legendary Toronto sports heroes Sammy Luftspring (boxing) and Joe Krol (football). Harry was no slouch when it came to sports himself, receiving recognition as a star baseball and softball player. He was considered by some to be the finest Canadian first basemen of his era.

Four times in the 1940s Eckler was a key man on Toronto teams (the Tip Tops twice, Dental Corps and Peoples) at the world fastball championships. In 1943 he was

Shirley and Harry Eckler

Pony League batting champion, racking up a .346 average.

In 1991, he was inducted in the Canadian Softball Amateur Hall of Fame and over the years he's received many other honors for his hardball/fastball prowess.

Shirley, meanwhile, didn't take to the night-owl lifestyle that so captivated Harry, but she stuck by her high school sweetheart and later developed sporting interests of her own.

A former club champion at the Huntington Golf and Country Club, and with four holes-in-one to her credit, Shirley almost matches Harry for sporting trophies and news stories lining the couple's basement rec room.

On Aug. 16, the Ecklers will celebrate 58 years of marriage together – a milestone in anyone's book. Harry is celebrating by singing his wife's praises, giving her the recognition he feels she so richly deserves.

Shirley is the secret to their lengthy marriage, he says. Without her patience for his unorthodox lifestyle, they never would have managed together this long, he says.

Though she never shared his love of the bar scene, Shirley did share some of his other pursuits, golf and Latin American music and dancing foremost among them, he said.

In the early 1950s and '60s they cut quite a fine rug together, dancing the cha-cha, meringue, rumba and mambo at various dance competitions, and adding to the families' trophy case.

Harry likes to tell the story of how they were asked to participate in a dance competition while on vacation in Florida. Unfortunately for him, he was forced to dance with a new partner, but so was Shirley.

So how did they do in the event? Harry finished last; Shirley was first.

In addition to her love of dancing and golf, Shirley is a fixture at Mount Sinai Hospital, volunteering at the hospital twice a week for 24 years.

In 1988, Shirley was honored by the Toronto Sun as a top achiever for her volunteer work, while in 1992, the Metro Toronto Canada Day Committee presented her with another achievement award on Canada's birthday.

Luckman a football Hall-of-Famer

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Sid Luckman, a Jewish football player who helped the Chicago Bears dominate the sport in the early 1940s, has died at the age of 81.

"He was the smartest football player I ever saw, and that goes for college or pro," Bob Zuppke, the famed University of Illinois football coach, was once quoted as saying.

A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., Luckman turned down offers from 40 colleges that sought to recruit him out of high school, opting instead to play for Columbia University.

Columbia offered no athletic scholarships, so Luckman worked his way through college painting walls and washing dishes in his fraternity house.

An outstanding tailback from 1936 to 1938, Luckman was named an All-American in 1937 and 1938.

His talent, versatility and sense of the game caught the attention of the Bears' owner and coach, George Halas, who was introducing the modern version of the T-formation offense. That alignment emphasized speed, deception and passing ability — and Luckman had the skills Halas needed.

Luckman played for four championship Chicago teams — in 1940, 1941, 1943 and 1946. In the 1940 title game, he led the Bears to a 73-0 rout of the Washington Redskins.

He was named the National Football League's Most Valuable Player in 1943. That year he set a single game record by throwing seven touchdown passes against the New York Giants. He threw for 453 yards in the 56-7 trouncing, the first time a quarterback had thrown for more than 400 yards in a single game.

Luckman was named All-Pro five times, from 1941 to 1944 and in 1947. He was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1965.

Luckman retired after 12 years in the NFL and launched a successful business career in the packaging industry.

Israeli dreams of NBA career

By PETER EPHROSS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — An Israeli point guard's dreams of playing in the NBA have been put on hold by a labor dispute.

Oded Katash recently opted out of his contract with the Israeli team Maccabi Tel Aviv in the hopes of signing with the New York Knicks. If his dream comes true, Katash would become the first Israeli to make it in U.S. professional basketball.

The Knicks expressed interest in the six-foot-four star after a recent workout but are prevented from making any player moves because of the dispute between the league's players and owners. The owners locked out the players July 1.

Katash's departure leaves Tel Aviv Maccabi without one of its star players. Katash averaged more than 20 points a game last season.

Several Israeli players have had tryouts with teams in the NBA, which has seen an increasing number of foreign players in recent years, but none has played in the regular season.

The Inside Back

Norman Spector's new job

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

It went almost unnoticed. The CJN printed it as a three-inch item on its front page, and the Globe and Mail, as expected, treated it like a standard appointment. But there is nothing standard about either Norman Spector's departure from the publisher's job at the Jerusalem Post or his becoming west coast correspondent for the Globe.

The move raises several intriguing questions. Did Spector quit? Or was he pushed? Insiders at the Post know little of the circumstances surrounding his departure.

Presumably hand-picked by owner Conrad Black in 1997 to publish the Post, Spector lasted barely a year in the job. And while in it, he was penning a freelance column on the Middle East for the Globe, owned by Black's archrival, Ken Thomson. How did he get away with that?

But the move to the Globe, the future competitor of the national daily Black is scheduled to launch in October, seems to follow a pattern of behavior in which Spector publicly turns on his former employer.

Spector declined The CJN's requests for an interview, saying he intends to write about his Post experiences in the Globe. "Competition, if you will," he explained.

As publisher, Spector was privy to sensitive financial and other information. For him to discuss that in the pages of the Globe would be poor form, to say the least.

Many will recall that Spector was Canada's ambassador to Israel from 1992 to 1995, a sensitive period that included Ottawa's chairing of a working group devoted to an especially delicate area: Palestinian refugees.

Following his diplomatic term, Spector's public statements were anything but diplomatic. He bad-mouthed and belittled his former employer, the government of Canada, disparaging it as a bit player in the Middle East. "Ineffectual" and even "counter-productive" are the words he used at one public forum in Toronto last year to describe Ottawa's efforts in the Mideast peace process.

He dismissed the refugee talks that Canada chairs, calling them "a sideshow," and claimed that Norway pulled off the diplomatic coup of the decade, if not the century, by finessing the Oslo accords "right under our noses... to our ever-lasting embarrassment and surprise."

The accusations hurt. Canada has been widely praised by Arabs and Israelis alike for its deft handling of the refugee talks. As for the Oslo accords, the back-channel negotiations which led to the document took all Western governments by surprise, including the United States, the "honest broker" between Palestinians and Israel.

Spector may have learned well the cynic's first rule of journalism (never let the facts get in the way of a good story), or he used knowledge gained during his ambassadorship to then heap scorn on the former signer of his paycheque. Either way, his stance was a cheap shot and a low blow.

More evidence of this pattern came last autumn when the Meshal affair blew up. Israel was found to have used faked Canadian passports in a botched bid to assassinate a Hamas leader in Jordan. Israel assured Canada that such an incident wouldn't happen again, and both countries said it had not happened before.

Spector practically cried out from the rooftops (in the pages of the Globe) that not only had Israel routinely used doctored Canadian passports in past spy operations, but had done so with Ottawa's consent.

Why would a former ambassador go out of his way to humiliate the Department of Foreign Affairs? Is it because Spector believes it is controlled by "Arabists," as he has also said? Was he again relying on highly sensitive information he'd acquired as ambassador? Did he care that his disclosures were damaging Canada-Israel relations – relations he once swore to uphold? Did he care that he may have been violating basic rules on employee-employer relations?

All of this leads to the conclusion that perhaps readers should consume Spector's Globe dispatches with a healthy skepticism.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am writing to you from Calgary in the hope that you can help me solve a difficult problem. My parents are in their 80s and live alone in Montreal; my brother and I no longer live in the same city. We visit when we can and both do what we can from a geographical distance. Physically both my parents are frail and in need of assistance. Please advise as to whom I can contact to get the help my parents require.

Alone and Worried

Dear Alone and Worried,

There are a number of resources in the city to help you and your parents. Firstly, the local community service centre (public health unit) in your parents' neighborhood should be contacted to arrange for an assessment of your parents' living situation. You do not specify what services your parents might require. For example, do they need home care assistance, a referral to a day centre, private or volunteer help? Secondly, in Montreal, the agency Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) can be contacted for referrals, for information about supplementation of services, to advocate for health and social services and/or for information on JSSE's Family Link program, i.e., assistance for seniors whose family members live out of town. With patience and time, help can be arranged. You should keep in mind that if the situation is urgent, you must stress this to the professionals you contact for assistance.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Israeli rescuers aid in Kenya

IDF sends 170 members to bombing site

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel's high-profile rescue team in Nairobi searched for survivors in the rubble. As of Monday morning, they had succeeded in rescuing a man, a woman and her son, and continued to dig feverishly for others.

The IDF Home Front Command rescue teams, aided by sniffer dogs, had been able to locate 29 bodies.

The United States and France also sent rescue teams to Nairobi, but the Israelis have been doing much of the work.

"We are digging wherever the Americans ask us to dig," said Lt.-Col. Ofer Loefler, the IDF spokesperson on the scene Sunday.

The Israeli team was concentrating on the worst of the wreckage, Loefler said, and it was a great help when they were finally able to get the use of a 100-ton crane.

By Sunday, an IDF search team had dug through the rubble to rescue one man, and had located a mother and her son, 13, who had been hiding on the top floor of the nearby 22-story Cooperative Bank building since the blast. The two were in good condition, but had been too afraid to come down.

The 170-member Israeli team included doctors who administered aide to the survivors and performed operations at a local hospital in cooperation with local doctors, the army said. By late Sunday they had performed 14 operations.

Forty medical crew members returned to Israel, Loefler said.

"I have been in other tragedies," he said. "But in the end it gives me great pride to see how our small country can lend a hand to others."

Fatah website, same old story

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As Israel negotiates with the Palestinians to change their covenant, an Internet Web site of Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement has released a constitution that calls for the destruction of Israel.

The Fatah organization Web site [www.fatah.org] does not distinguish between Israel and the territories captured in the Six Day War. The constitution calls the Zionist movement "racial, colonial and aggressive in ideology, goals, organization and method. The Israeli existence in Palestine is a Zionist invasion with a colonial expansive base, and it is a natural ally to colonialism and international imperialism.

"Liberating Palestine and protecting its holy places is an Arab, religious and human obligation," it says.

Article 12 of the constitution lists the goal of the Fatah movement as "complete liberation of Palestine, and eradication of Zionist economic, political, military and cultural existence." The constitution says: "Armed public revolution is the inevitable method for liberating Palestine.

"Armed struggle," the constitution reads, "is a strategy and not a tactic, and the Palestinian Arab people's armed revolution is a decisive factor in the liberation fight and in uprooting the Zionist existence, and this struggle will not cease unless the Zionist state is demolished and Palestine is completely liberated."

The constitution does not mention the Oslo Accords, supported by Fatah, but says it opposes any "political solution offered as an alternative to demolishing the Zionist occupation in Palestine..."

Fatah spokespeople, who attended a swearing-in ceremony in Gaza late Sunday for Arafat's new cabinet, could not be reached for comment. In the past, however, Fatah officials have dismissed statements calling for the destruction of Israel as mere rhetoric.

Israeli officials said they were stunned by the Fatah Web site.

David Bar-Ilan, director of policy planning for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, called the constitution "in some ways worse than the Palestinian covenant. This is as clear an indication as any that the PLO has not abandoned its intention to destroy the State of Israel," he said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Holocaust Exhibit Planned

OTTAWA — The Canadian Museum of Civilization has announced that within three years it plans to open a one-year exhibit on the Holocaust, after which the exhibit may be shown across Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it hopes the plan will lead to a permanent freestanding national Holocaust memorial museum in Ottawa, something it has been advocating.

B'nai Brith Canada expressed disappointment that the decision "was reached without consultation from Canada's senior Jewish organizations" and that "a temporary, rather than a permanent exhibition, is a piecemeal approach to Holocaust awareness and education."

ISRAEL

Name Change Demanded

JERUSALEM — Beit Shemesh should consider cancelling its twin city arrangement with the Croatian city of Split if that city does not change the name of a local street named for wartime minister of education, Mile Budak, The Simon Wiesenthal Centre says.

Budak served in the World War II Croatian government that carried out a policy of genocide against Croatian Jewry and mass murder and/or forced conversion to Catholicism of Serbs and Gypsies.

The Association of Olim from Yugoslavia supports the centre's initiative and is making the same appeal to change the name of Mile Budak Street.

Will Return Property

JERUSALEM — On a visit to Israel, Romanian Prime Minister Radu Vasile vowed to support legislation returning Jewish property confiscated during and after World War II. The World Jewish Restitution Organization estimates thousands of communal properties and as many as hundreds of thousands of private properties owned by Jews in Romania were confiscated by the Nazis and the Communist government.

Defence Model Displayed

TEL AVIV — A model of Israel's Arrow anti-missile system was displayed at a military exhibition marking the country's jubilee, but a key component of the system, which is still in the testing phase, was kept from public view. The system, co-financed by Israel and the United States, is expected to be deployed next year.

Journalists to Cut Contact

WEST BANK — The Palestinian Journalists Union called on its members to sever all contacts with their Israeli counterparts. A union official said the Arab Journalists Union, with members in 16 Arab countries, had adopted a similar stand last month and was planning to blacklist all members who ignored the ban.

WORLD

Israeli Denied Visa

TUNIS — Tunisia refused to issue a visa to Israel's incoming envoy to the North African country. The move comes amid deteriorating relations between the two countries. Tunisia and Israel established diplomatic ties in 1995 in the wake of the Oslo accords.

Resentencing Ordered

NEW YORK — A U.S. federal appeals court ruled that the four men convicted of the 1993 bombing at the World Trade Centre received a fair trial, but the court ordered resentencing for the militant Muslims because they did not have lawyers present during the original sentencing.

The four, who were arrested within weeks of the bombing, have said they carried out the attack in retaliation for U.S. support of Israel.

Call for Holocaust Museum

BERLIN — A newly formed foundation is reviving calls for a Holocaust museum in Germany. The initiative comes amid continuing controversy regarding a proposed national Holocaust memorial in Berlin.

Crosses to Remain

OSWIECIM, Poland — Foreign Minister Bronislaw Geremek said his government has no plans to remove some 50 crosses outside the site of the Auschwitz death camp, as requested by the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem.

Because of an agreement between Poland and the Catholic Church leaving the latter in charge of religious symbols, the government would leave the decision to the Vatican, Geremek said.

Church officials said they have no plans to deal with the crosses, erected last month by a Catholic workers group as part of a campaign to maintain Christian symbols at the site.

Meanwhile, nationalist and Catholic activists recently erected two additional nine-foot crosses near the camp.

Cantorial Council Meets

NEW YORK — The 38th Annual Convention of the Cantorial Council of America (CCA) held recently highlighted Israel's 50th anniversary. Convention chair, Cantor Leon Kahn of the Washington Heights Congregation in New York City, was elected president for the coming term.

Participants in musical workshops and discussions on the Cantorate and Jewish Music included cantors Stephen Glass and Aric Subar of Montreal and David Bagley of Toronto.

The CCA is affiliated with the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary and is sponsored by the Belz School at Yeshiva University.

Professorship Established

WALTHAM, Mass. — Brandeis University is establishing its first professorship in Jewish Education.

Made possible by a $2.5 million gift from the Mandel family of Cleveland, the Mandel Professorship in Jewish Education at Brandeis will be the first of its kind in North America at an institution of higher learning not affiliated with one of Judaism's three major streams.

Jewish Theatre Opens

COLOGNE — A Jewish theatre, which will be the second in Germany, is planning to open here in December. It will perform two-thirds of its plays in German and the remainder in Yiddish.

Bishops Vote on Jerusalem

LAMBETH, England — At their recent conference, Anglican bishops voted that Jerusalem should be the capital of both Israel and a Palestinian state. The bishops' conference is held once a decade.

Golden report takes aim at homelessness

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Homelessness is still on the rise but the problem can be "significantly reduced," according to Anne Golden, chair of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman's Homelessness Action Task Force and president of United Way of Greater Toronto.

The task force's interim report, released last month, outlines nine strategies to break the cycle of homelessness, among them building additional housing for chronic shelter users who may suffer from addiction or mental illness; creating more affordable housing; and ensuring a more equitable distribution of low-cost housing and services across the province.

Data collected at hostels over the past nine years does not track the religion or ethnicity of shelter users, but about 13 percent of Toronto Jews live below the poverty line, according to the Jewish Family & Child Service.

In 1997, the agency provided $1.4 million to over 2,000 people for housing.

"I think it's worth mentioning that the Jewish community is [also] participating in a very commendable way in the volunteer response," said Golden in a telephone interview last week, referring to a few initiatives, most notably Holy Blossom Temple's participation in the Out of the Cold program which offers food and shelter to homeless people on a weekly basis.

The program, in which Holy Blossom participates on a rotating basis with local churches, is not an answer to homelessness, although it plays an important role, Golden said. "It's a crisis response to a crisis situation."

Anne Golden

The 62-page report, entitled Breaking the Cycle of Homelessness, was written following visits to shelters and a variety of housing alternatives as well as consultations with experts including homeless and formerly homeless people. The four-person task force was created by Lastman in January following the November release of United Way's Beyond Survival: Homelessness in Metro Toronto.

A more specific set of recommendations, to be implemented over the next decade, will be outlined in the group's final report, due out later this year.

"Our intention will be to create a realistic, implementable action plan," said Golden.

The "solvable" part of the homeless problem focuses on chronic homelessness or homelessness related to lack of affordability, reflecting 60 percent of the homeless population, she explained.

The incidence of family poverty is increasing, as is the depth of that poverty, Golden said. Families and youth are the fastest growing segment of the homeless population, according to the report. In 1996, 26,000 different people, including 5,300 children, used Toronto's hostel system.

The proposed solution will involve all three levels of government, according to the report. "It will involve a fair-share approach," said Golden. "All the affordable housing cannot continue to be shoved into the City of Toronto."

The task force is in the process of determining the cost to each level of government, Golden said. "Ultimately, person by person, [prevention] will cost less [than emergency response]...It's a very complicated and sophisticated problem."

A homelessness prevention strategy must focus on preventing at-risk people from losing their homes, the report states. Prevention will require policies to enable homeless people to access and maintain stable housing.

Although Golden is not optimistic about eliminating short-term and emergency-induced homelessness, she said if she and the other task force members weren't hopeful about eliminating chronic homelessness, it would be impossible to work as hard as they intend to on the final report.

Israeli baby dies after flight to Canada

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER

TORONTO — A 4½-month-old Israeli baby girl died recently after suddenly developing breathing problems on a flight into Toronto, according to Air Canada and Peel Regional Police officials.

Air Canada, police and coroner's office officials would not release the official cause of death of Chedva Busch, who was travelling with her parents Sharon and Chaim and her 1½-year-old sister on Air Canada's July 27 flight number 885 non-stop from Israel.

The baby, a native of Zichron Ya'acov, was pronounced dead at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children at 5:45 p.m. on July 27, according to Peel Regional Police spokesperson Gerald Davenport.

Elie Wiesel was probably the first to convey the poignant and sage notion that perhaps, after all, the most appropriate, most fitting human response to what we inadequately call the Holocaust, is silence.

Language is defining; but to define is, by its very nature, to limit as well. And how terrible it would be, if in our attempt to explain what happened we would by that process, actually limit our understanding of what happened.

But human beings are literary beings as much as they are emotional and intellectual beings. The need to use words, to express, to tell the story, is as deeply rooted into our souls as is the need to cry.

We have always cherished more the imperative of human testimony than we have been bothered by the fallibility of human understanding. The risk of somehow delimiting or diminishing understanding is outweighed by far by the risk of failing to give testimony, by failing to bear witness.

This may explain in part, the fact that thousands of books have been written about the Holocaust.

Recently, I completed reading one of those books, Fugitive Pieces, written by by Anne Michaels and published by McClelland & Stewart.

Like an archeological excavation through which one tenderly but excitedly sifts, the book is an exploration through one layer after another of finely, intricately, interdependent levels of narrative, description, reflection and insight into the nature of history, testimony, memory, language, emotions, relationships, courage, heroism and love.

The narrative, the story of Jakob Beer, rescued as a young child, literally from the bog of Poland, and subsequently raised by the singular Greek scholar Athos Roussos, is merely one level, albeit the first level of discovery.

Then there is the level of the book's format, both its literary and intellectual structure. As York University professor Ruby Newman told Bill Gladstone in his article on Anne Michaels for a series in The CJN on the Jewish literary scene, (May 7) "It's an extended poem in many ways. It needs to be studied; it can't be read right through."

There is also the level of Michael's descriptive power, which when combined with her laser-accurate insights into the ghastly nature of Holocaust-related suffering, holds the reader in a crystal world of clarity and precision.

As an example, Michaels describes Jakob in the hiding place in his home "behind the wallpaper in the cupboard, cramming [my] head sideways between choking plaster and beams, eyelashes scraping" as the Nazis suddenly burst in to destroy his family.

From his horror-confined hideout Jakob tells us that "[I] wanted to go to my parents, to touch them. But I couldn't, unless I stepped on their blood."

As he watched the ending of his parents' lives, he reflects that "the soul leaves the body instantly, as if it can hardly wait to be free: my mother's face was not her own. My father was twisted with falling. Two shapes in the flesh-heap, his, hands."

Michaels achingly explores her subject, the central mystery of Holocaust-related suffering, through essential archetypes, namely, a survivor, a child of survivors, and the "outsider." She deftly creates an intricate geometry. The key different characters observe Jakob with different, key perspectives.

As if standing at the centre of a prism, the reader sees, indeed feels, the convergence and penetration of assorted lines of light into an impenetrably dark place.

With soaring skill and touching humility, Michaels leads the reader through the sorrow-stricken, magnificent terrain of the human heart.

She demonstrates profound understanding of the fallen markers that we pass along the way.

The sheer magnetic force of her writing, in effect makes of Michaels also a scribe, poetic in style, depicting chapters of Jewish history, for example: "In the zudeccha (ghetto) the Spanish silver siddur with hinges in the spine, the tallith and candlesticks are being buried in the earth under the kitchen floor. Letters to absent children, photos, are buried.

While the men and women who place these valuables in the ground have never done so before, they go through the motions with centuries of practice guiding their hands, a ritual as familiar as the Sabbath. Even the child who runs to bring his favorite toy, the dog with the little wooden wheels, in order to place it in the hold in the kitchen floor, seems to act with knowledge. All across Europe there are such buried treasures – a scrap of lace, a bowl, ghetto diaries that have never been found."

Fugitive Pieces is a rare literary achievement. Through its lyricism, poetry and insight, it communicates the silence that may indeed be the most appropriate human response to what we inadequately call the Holocaust. But in that silence, we must never ever cast aside what Michaels calls the important lessons: "Look carefully; record what you see. Find a way to make beauty necessary; find a way to make necessity beautiful."

Engel chairing 1998 UJA Women's Campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Judy Engel has been involved in numerous Jewish charitable organizations, but somehow she always comes back to United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

The 41-year-old ex-Montrealer, a daughter of Holocaust survivors who is the 1998 UJA Women's Campaign chair, believes in the primacy of a central fundraising organization, she said in a recent interview at her home.

"I think before you make any other gift you should make your UJA gift," she said. "Without that, we don't sustain our community."

A little over half the money raised by UJA here is spent locally. Aside from subsidizing Jewish education (the main expenditure), funds are directed to agencies such as the

Judy Engel

Bernard Betel Centre for seniors, Jewish Family & Child Services and Zareinu Educational Centre for children with special needs.

Money earmarked for Israel is used to fund aliyah and absorption, and to purchase social services, including programs that support pluralism, noted Engel.

Engel and her husband David, who co-chairs UJA's King David's Circle Division, got their start in volunteer life as 23-year-olds in Montreal, when Judy was pregnant with the first of their three children.

After reading an ad in The CJN, they contacted Montreal's Jewish federation and became involved in its leadership development program and in UJA. Recently they came full circle by hosting a UJA young leadership retreat at their Toronto home.

When they moved here in 1983, one of the first phone calls Engel made was to offer her services to UJA, she recalls.

Since that time, she has been involved with a number of organizations. Among other involvements, she is on the board of the Baycrest Foundation, is a past president of the parents' association at United Synagogue Day School and was a chaperone this year on March of the Living.

Her focus at Women's Campaign, which raises nearly $4 million annually, is to continue to educate board members "so they'll be the best canvassers they can be."

She is a firm believer in UJA missions to Israel and in mini-missions locally so that participants see firsthand where donations go. Her recent participation in March of the Living reinforced for her the importance of supporting Israel.

"We have very well equipped volunteers," she said. "They know the concerns. They know the answers, and if they don't, they'll find someone who does."

One of Engel's biggest challenges as a canvasser came last year when she called a donor who had decided not to contribute any more. The woman, whose daughter-in-law had undergone a non-Orthodox conversion to Judaism, was concerned about the Jewish status of her grandchildren according to Israeli law, in light of the controversy surrounding the Ne'eman Committee recommendations.

She has seen an "overwhelming, positive response" to requests for three-year pledges and for an increase of 25 percent in the amount of each pledge by the third year.

UJA first tried a three-year-pledge campaign three years ago, freeing up canvassers to seek more new pledges in the subsequent years.

"It allows the community to plan a little better," said Engel, who sees the community as "an extended family."

This Sky knows no limits

What inspires creativity in the artist? Is creativity in the artist the inevitable expression of an accumulation of experiences. Or does creativity flow from a single, watershed experience? Ibn Ezra, the great medieval philosopher, believed that the poet and the artist create by nature, not because of what they acquired through learning. This is the third article in a series of sketches on Artists & Creativity that will explore such questions.

By BILL GLADSTONE

Amy Sky

The sky's the limit for Amy Sky, the 30-something pop singer and composer who joins me on the patio of a midtown Toronto cafe. The morning is bright and her sunglasses stay on. In my opinion, Sky's career is on a star trajectory and she may soon need those sunglasses for another purpose beyond protecting her eyes from the sun.

The root of Amy Sky's considerable success to date has been an uncanny knack at writing highly appealing pop songs for first-rate singers like Anne Murray, Diana Ross, Melissa Manchester, Reba McEntyre, Marie Osmond and Olivia Newton John. Possessed herself of a gifted voice, Sky stepped into the limelight several years ago with her first CD Cool Rain, from which several hit singles have flowed.

Next came a major role in the Toronto production of the musical Blood Brothers, in which she projected that velvety, emotive, Ronstadtian voice well into the rafters. Many live concert dates later, Sky has just released a powerful new CD, Burnt By The Sun, which may make new inroads for her into the all-important American market.

Sky moved to Nashville in 1983 and to Los Angeles in 1986, and returned in the early 1990s to Toronto, her native city and the city in which she attained a university degree in classical composition after studying classical music from an early age. "I was always making up my own tunes," she says. "Even by the age of six I was making up little classical pieces. I didn't discover popular music until I was 11, and then I began writing my own pop songs."

She cites a valuable song-writing trick she learned in Nashville: always start with the title. "A Nashville producer told me, 'If a title is strong enough, then you know what the whole story of the song is about.' He used Stand By Your Man as an example. Titles are the hooks with which you may pull the fish out of the water."

A self-admitted "title scavenger," she scans old books and movies for that fortuitous phrase that strikes a deep and resonant chord within. "Sometimes I'll hear a title and I won't know how to turn it into a song for some time. But usually once the light bulb goes on...."

That light-bulb has produced such memorable hits as If My Heart Had Wings, Unbreakable Heart, Soledad and Cool Rain, and helped to establish Sky among the first rank of contemporary popular composers.

Although she often writes the music collaboratively, she says she prefers to work solo when penning the lyrics. "It's probable I enjoy writing lyrics more than the music. I love to tell a story." Her songs, she says, come directly from her life experience. "Anything I put into a song is a reflection of what I feel in life. I don't put on a persona; I don't play-act an emotional role. If I wrote it, it's all rooted in my emotional truth. Like any writer, you change the names and dates to protect the innocent."

"Faxes from heaven" is her term for the ideas that come to her for songs. "I don't know where the ideas come from – they sort of bubble up from some divine source. It feels like they're coming to me and through me rather than from me."

The wife of composer Marc Jordan with whom she has had two children, Sky says she does most of her lyrical composition on the go. "I usually go for a walk – it usually takes me about an hour to get into gear. In the first 10 or 15 minutes my mind is clearing. If you want to access the right or creative side of your brain, you should get the left side of your brain doing some routine thing. Once you get into that sort of rhythmic trance, then the ideas start coming."

Once a staff composer with MCA Music who was paid to write 20 songs a year, Sky knows that there is no commercial formula you can follow that will make you more productive as an artist. "You have to cultivate the receptive or the spiritual part of yourself," she says. "It's like tilling the earth. You can have beautiful fertile land but until you prepare it, nothing will ever grow."

While Jewish themes play a bigger role in her life than they do in her music, Sky is not above using a word or phrase in Yiddish at an appropriate moment. Such a moment arises when I mention that lovely high note she reaches so effortlessly near the end of Cool Rain. "I believe it's important for a singer to use her full range," she begins. Then she adds, "I have a friend who says it's a good ge-schry. That's a good Jewish word for 'wailing.'"

Silver named York University's dean of fine arts

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For the past three decades, Phillip Silver has left his mark on stage design across Canada.

Silver's artistry has graced numerous theatres, notably the Winter Garden Theatre and the Tarragon Theatre in Toronto, the Citadel Theatre in Edmonton, the Vancouver Playhouse Company, the Stratford Festival and the National Arts Center in Ottawa.

His productions include The Crucible, South Pacific, The Merchant of Venice, Aspects of Love, The Mousetrap, Brighton Beach Memoirs and A Man for all Seasons.

In recognition of his accomplishments, Silver has been chosen as one of the 10 designers who will represent Canada at next June's Prague Quadrennial, an international showcase for stage design.

For now, however, he has his hands full as the newly appointed dean of York University's Faculty of Fine Arts, the largest of its kind in Canada, with a staff of 140 professors and more than 2,300 students. (Among its graduates are Richard Rose, a Stratford Festival director, and Lewis Baumander of Toronto's Skylight Theatre).

With an interdisciplinary fine arts cultural studies program, and with departments in theatre, dance, film, video, music and visual arts, York University is certainly a leader in its field in North America.

And if Silver, 55, has his way, the university's fine arts faculty will continue to be on the cutting edge of new developments.

Silver, whose association with York University goes back to 1982, assumes the deanship after a rough 10-year period of cutbacks and zero growth.

As the faculty's chief financial officer, fundraiser and visionary, he will have to deal with the fiscal realities of the 1990s and train a fresh crop of students for the 21st century.

Silver, whose term of office is five years, with the possibility of an extension, is thrilled by his appointment.

"My only regret as dean is that I won't have as much contact with students," he said. "It's really exciting to work with young people with potential."

His connection with students, however, remains essentially intact. One of his functions is to encourage students to explore a question central to the faculty's existence and indeed its raison d'etre: What is the role of the arts in the 21st century?

"We're told that the arts are not important, but we're bombarded by the arts. Its integral to our society. I want students to have a better appreciation of it."

These are not mere words. For Silver, the father of three grown children aged 18, 24 and 27, theatre runs in his blood.

Phillip Silver

When he was a boy growing up in Edmonton, his mother Estelle introduced him to the milieu by enrolling him in a theatre course.

Later, at the University of Alberta, he took a degree in English, with emphasis on dramatic literature.

In Montreal's National Theatre School, where he toyed with the idea of becoming an actor, he studied production and design.

From 1967 to 1976, Silver was the resident designer of the Citadel Theatre in his home town. In 1978, he embarked on a career as a freelance designer.

All told, he has been involved in the design of upwards of 300 productions, and has served as an architecture consultant to McGill University and the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

Silver, whose wife Brenda is a teacher, has lived in Stratford for the past 20 years. He does not mind the 1½-hour commute to the York University campus.

Designed ark

One of about 20 Jews in Stratford, he is a member of Temple Shalom in Waterloo, whose Torah ark he designed in 1996. The synagogue shares a building with a Protestant church, an arrangement that is perhaps unique in Canada.

Silver's family has deep roots in Canada.

His great-grandfather, Herman Bernard of Vienna, settled in Montreal in the 1880s, and went west 20 years later. He was one of the early presidents of Edmonton's first synagogue, Congregation Beth Israel.

Charles, Silver's father, owned a retail clothing store in western Edmonton. Charles' family, which hailed from the Ukraine, settled in Calgary before World War I.

Silver, the recipient of three Dora Mavor Moore Awards for excellence in set and lighting design, contends that the function of a stage designer is two-fold: to support the text of a play and to strengthen audience participation in the creation of make-believe.

He has no illusions about his contribution. Stage design, though important, is not a crucial element in the success of a play, he believes. The key, as always, is the vigor of the story.

"My stage design won't save a show if there is not something fundamentally engaging between the text and the audience. But I can help."

In designing a production, Silver is very much text-oriented. And he will not accept a commission unless it captures his imagination.

"We're in great shape. Unfortunately, few Canadians know it. The frustrating thing is, we haven't been good at trumpeting our work."

Hopeful signs

The provincial premiers and territorial leaders concluded their annual two-day meeting last week. The conference, hosted by Saskatchewan Premier Roy Romanow in Saskatoon, was remarkably free of the petty, self-serving, school-yard finger-pointing at the bete noire federal government that has so frequently characterized the gatherings in the past.

That is not to say, of course, that the differences between the two levels of government have been resolved, or are even yet close to being resolved. Nor is that to say that the differences among the provincial and territorial leaders themselves have been resolved. The main agenda item, refashioning a new "social union" for Canada, was far too complex to allow for that.

But the more moderate, cooperation-seeking tone of the proceedings was noteworthy. As a result, the substantive results of the meeting, namely, laying the groundwork for the next phase of the federal-provincial dialogue, were also worthy of note and worthy of commendation.

No doubt, the tone and positive "atmospherics" of the gathering were in part attributable to the chairmanship of Romanow, a man known for cool, temperate, reasoned judgment. More likely, however, the premiers were simply responding to the carefully polled moods of their respective electorates, irritated by disingenuous public outbursts of political pique, distrusting of their elected officials, and gravely worried about the state of national health care.

By meeting's end, the premiers and leaders expressed one common fiscal and social priority: more money from Ottawa for health care. They unanimously called on the federal government to restore the $6.2 billion dollars it has removed from transfer payments to the provinces since 1995. But even this recommendation was expressed calmly, without clamor or grandstanding. The mechanics of the restoration were left to federal decision makers, thereby deftly tossing the ball back into the federal court.

On the subject of a proposed new "social union" for Canada, there were also encouraging, hopeful signs. The most significant was the fact of and the nature of Premier Lucien Bouchard's involvement. There was clearly a change in his attitude to the issue of overlapping federal-provincial programming in areas of provincial jurisdiction. This change in attitude was matched by a change in deeds as well as in words, as was evident at the very outset.

In joining the gathering, Bouchard agreed to a unanimous statement that "both orders of government are involved in Canada's social union," and that a "stronger partnership" between the federal government and the provinces is needed to secure social programs. As reported in the Ottawa Citizen, this "in itself was significant since Mr. Bouchard has long held that any attempt to work in partnership with the federal government on social programs amounts to inviting it to invade exclusive provincial jurisdiction."

The premier agreed to a federal proposal that the right of a province to opt out of a federal program was to be conditioned upon the province's providing a program that "addresses the priority areas" dealt with by that national program. The change in attitude by Quebec was praised by the other premiers as well as by federal Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stephane Dion. For his part, Dion hoped that there would be "a lot of flexibility in the federation, in order to allow each province to invent their own programs."

Of course, it is much too early in the process to draw definitive conclusions about the Quebec premier's contributions or motives. Nor are we either so naive or, for that matter, so desperate as to believe that Bouchard has altered his strategic objective for Quebec from separatism to federalism. But since we have never refrained from criticizing Bouchard in the past, we do not recoil from expressing commendation, albeit guarded, at his constructive participation last week with the other premiers and territorial leaders.

Canada's abysmal record on Israel

We at the Toronto Zionist Council (TZC) were taken aback at your designation of Canada as "precious" (Editorial, May 28). That is hardly the word we would use for a country pursuing a foreign policy which is so blatantly anti-Zionist.

Several years ago, TZC engaged in a campaign of financial support for the Jewish communities in Judea/Samaria/Gaza (YESHA). In no time, Revenue Canada was investigating us and subsequently saw fit to revoke our charitable number. The grounds were that "the provision of financial support for social services within Israeli settlements in the Occupied Territories [sic] would contribute to the continued viability of those settlements, and therefore would be contrary and offensive to Canada's public policy on this issue," which, according to a 1995 government position paper, does not recognize "permanent" Israeli control over the territories "occupied" in 1967.

Canada appears not the least troubled by the manner in which the said lands were wrested from Israel by Jordan and Egypt in '48; nor how they came to be "occupied" by Israel 20 years later when she was again attacked by her neighbors. We should be very angry that Canada should presume to interfere in such a blatant way in the internal affairs of a sovereign state.

Finally, we Jews should be very, very angry at Canada's voting record in the United Nations. Everybody now knows that she supported upgrading the PLO's status, in itself a violation of the "spirit" of the accords. Not so well known, perhaps, is her vote several years ago in support of an Arab-inspired resolution denying Israel's entitlement to any part of Jerusalem.

The Canada-Israel Committee should not be "disappointed" at the action of our Diaspora hosts; Israel is the homeland of the Jews. And YESHA is the heartland of that homeland. And no host country, no matter how momentarily benign, or "precious," should be allowed to wrest our "yerushah" from us.

Resident gives views on balcony sukkot

I am one of the residents of the Le Sanctuaire complex who put up a sukkah on my balcony. I would simply like to correct the impression your readers may have received by reading your article on June 25, in which it was reported that Judge André Rochon declared that the syndicate (Syndicat Northcrest) had tried to reasonably accommodate us.

The condo president, Mr. Pierre Gadbois, did not respond to any of my phone calls, although I was trying to communicate with him in an effort to resolve this matter. It all began when he sent out letters to all Jews in the building advising us it was illegal to put up a sukkah on our balconies. Yet he never took legal action to stop any other objects, such as Christmas decorations and satellite dishes, even though they are on the balconies on a permanent basis.

The syndicate made an offer to allow a common sukkah only after the Canadian Jewish Congress intervened on our behalf, but there was no time to arrange for one four days prior to the holiday. Also, the site offered was not suitable for a variety of reasons, one of which was a halachic problem.

We were then taken to court on the eve of the holiday in an attempt to secure a temporary injunction. The syndicate lawyer came armed with hundreds of pages of documents, obviously having been prepared well in advance. I had gone to court armed only with a Bible. With the help of arguments from B'nai Brith lawyer Steven Slimovitch, Judge Marc Beaudoin ruled there was no serious or irreparable damage and allowed the sukkot to remain. Yet the syndicate would not accept this and immediately proceeded to attempt to secure a permanent injunction.

After this initial round, I again tried to negotiate a solution in the spirit of compromise, yet the syndicate spurned all my offers of compromise and even withdrew their initial offer of a common sukkah and now only offered a "tent" that anyone in the building can use at any time. They did not offer any guarantees that the tent would be available to us during the Sukkot holiday, nor would they guarantee that it would be halachically acceptable. These are not "technical" issues, as Judge Rochon put it, but halachic ones, which Judge Rochon simply did not seem to grasp.

Dion wrongly compares Jews to Quebecers

In an article in the Montreal Gazette, Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stephane Dion commented on how similar the Jewish community in Quebec is to "Quebecers eager to preserve their francophone heritage." Immediately I wondered whether a government minister was promoting unity or disunity. Is this an established distinction? Does the Jewish community, or for that matter any other community, separate itself from "Quebecers?" Is this a federal perception?

I am of the opinion that this comment illustrates an unacceptable level of ignorance for a representative of the Canadian people. There is no similarity nor parallel between being Jewish in Canada and being French Canadian in Quebec. Furthermore, the Jewish people are first and foremost representatives of a religious system. French Canadians are a linguistic group and the last time I checked, currently citizens of Canada. Likewise, a Jewish person's relationship to Israel originates as purely a religious commitment.

The rescue of a community's past

By REVA KAISER

The Jewish world is by now familiar with Judy Feld Carr's efforts to save the lives of thousands of Syrian Jews. Although it was a well-kept secret for over two decades, the truth has come out in recent years. Affectionately known as "the mother of Syrian Jewry," Feld Carr risked her life to bring more than 2,000 Jews out of Syria, paying hefty sums to do so, as Jewish emigration was strictly prohibited.

It all began with a few packages. In 1972, at the request of Rabbi Ibrahim Hamra, the chief rabbi of Syria, Judy Feld Carr and her late husband, Dr. Ronald Feld, shipped boxes of Judaica and sefarim (religious Hebrew texts) to the religion-starved Jewish community of Syria. But that was only the beginning; never did Feld Carr imagine that the relatively simple task of supplying the Syrian Jews with religious books and other necessities would lead to in a 23-year-long odyssey of saving the Jewish lives of this centuries-old community.

What most people do not know, furthermore, is that while saving the future of the Syrian community, Feld Carr was also saving its past.

This second rescue began in the 1990s, when most of the community was already out of Syria. Feld Carr started hearing from the Syrian Jews about the rich Jewish heritage they had been forced to leave behind: the magnificent synagogues, the beautiful artifacts, the hand-crafted sifrei Torah and other sefarim. It was illegal to remove these precious religious artifacts from the country because they were all state-owned.

Feld Carr was first approached in early 1993 about rescuing the Judaica of the Syrian Jews, when a former resident of Aleppo told her about a "fine book" that had been left behind. This book, she was told, was a beautiful sefer, written in the 14th century. Through her contacts, Feld Carr arranged for its illegal removal from Syria. Her methods were and remain secret, but Feld Carr was successful on her first try. Her efforts were worth it, as the beautiful Tanach is estimated to be almost 1,000 years old. Painstakingly created, it was written on fine parchment, its pages decorated with delicate roses.

Feld Carr was thrilled. "I saw there might be a way of getting these books out," she said. But even more than that, she felt the power of such a small book. "I realized that when I was holding it, I was holding an amazing piece of history."

When Feld Carr visited Israel later that year, a curator at the Israel Museum told her about the rumored existence of the Damascus Keter, a hand-written Tanach, the crowning glory of religious Syrian texts. Feld Carr's interest was immediately piqued and she decided to find this treasure and return it to the Jewish community.

Feld Carr did not listen to the advice that she focus her energies on saving people and not chase a rumor about a book. With the help of her many contacts, she found the Keter in the basement of a Damascus synagogue. Sheltered in a glass case, it was only removed once a year, on Shavuot, when it was used during services.

It was illegal to remove the Keter, since it was on the Syrian government's inventory list of religious articles, but one of Feld Carr's contacts was willing to help save the holy tome. Feld Carr knew that no Jew in Syria would risk being caught with it. She therefore found a trusted friend who was going to Damascus for business, but she decided not to confide the true nature of the "gift" he had agreed to bring her from a "friend" in Syria.

Ten days after Feld Carr's friend met with her contact in Syria, Feld Carr flew to New York to pick up her "gift." She was handed one of the oldest and most sacred books belonging to the Jewish people. It was wrapped in a black plastic shopping bag.

Written on almost translucent vellum, the Damascus Keter was penned in Spain in the early 14th century. While the scribe is unknown, it is clear this masterpiece was an artisan's lifetime project. Two deeds of sale were inscribed inside: the first, written in Judeo-Arabic, details the sefer's purchase by Abraham Sarfati for currency of King Enrique IV (1454-1474); the second, written in Rashi script, documents the Keter's sale by Sarfati in 1515, for currency of Sultan Selim I of the Ottoman empire.

It is very likely the Keter was carried from Spain by Jews fleeing the Spanish Inquisition and found a haven in Damascus. But almost 500 years later, in November 1993, Feld Carr rescued it from yet another land of Jewish persecution and brought it to safety in Israel.

Soon after, Feld Carr was contacted by a man in Aleppo who wanted to save the thousands of sefarim held in Syria. These books were stored in damp synagogue basements, since the community had started using the new texts Feld Carr had sent. Though the modern ones were easier to read and in better condition, their predecessors were an important part of Jewish history. "They [members of the community] were distraught that they'd be leaving, and leaving their heritage behind," says Feld Carr of the brave Jews who smuggled out the sefarim.

It began with the occasional box sent to Feld Carr. One or two sefarim were wrapped in apricot shoe leather (a taffy-like candy) and hidden in a case of cookie boxes. The packages arrived at Feld Carr's home labelled "candy" and addressed to no one. The smugglers increased their efforts and sent the "candy" boxes to about half-a-dozen nameless addresses. Feld Carr was also sent the ornate metal menorahs that graced either side of the Aron Kodesh in an Aleppo synagogue. In all, a few hundred volumes were saved.

These rescued texts help tell the story of the Syrian Jewish community during the past millennium. A thriving Jewish community since biblical times, the city of Aleppo was also a trading post that connected the Middle Eastern country with Europe and the rest of Asia. Syria's Jewish community relied on travelling Jewish merchants to provide them with the sefarim needed to maintain Jewish learning and life in Syria, since a Hebrew printing press was not established in the country until 1865.

But the Aleppo community still managed to amass quite a collection. The sefarim accumulating in Feld Carr's home originated from Greece, Turkey, Poland, Russia, Italy, Germany and Israel. One of the oldest books Feld Carr received was a Sefer Toldot, printed in Venice in 1553. Aside from biblical texts, the volumes were books on commentaries, law, responsa and personal writings.

One text that found its way to Aleppo from Amsterdam had been printed at the start of the 16th century. In Syria, it was owned by a Mr. Silvero, apparently the treasurer of the synagogue. During the end of the 17th century and the start of the 18th, he recorded members' dues inside the book's cover.

Today, these texts belong to the Hebrew University's National Library of Israel in Jerusalem. An integral part of Jewish history, these sefarim became a link between the Ashkenazi and Sefardi communities, connecting all Jews with the words of the Torah.

In February 1994, the last Torah of Aleppo was smuggled out of Syria inside a suitcase. Unfortunately, its valuable and ornate silver case had to be left behind. Feld Carr was not part of this rescue, but became involved in its story when it was given to her as a gift of appreciation by the carrier – his thanks to Feld Carr for bringing him and his family out of Syria.

Although his gambit was almost exposed at the airport when an official approached to check the bag, the man was saved by his baby's impatient wail. Annoyed by the crying infant and appeased with a comfortable bribe, the official let the family go – and the last Torah of Aleppo left Syria in a suitcase.

Feld Carr was overwhelmed by the treasure she had been given. She knew that the act of saving it bore the risk of a 15-year jail sentence. Written on soft leather, the Torah is believed to be between 200 and 300 years old. On the back of the scroll is a note written in Hebrew documenting the Torah's acquisition in 1814 "for the worship of my Creator." Today, the Torah is in Israel, waiting to be presented to the Chief Rabbinate. It will then be donated to Israel's Aleppo community.

There are not many Jews left in Syria. Those who remain do so willingly; the government no longer restrains them. But there is a wealth of Jewish heritage and history buried in the deserted synagogues of a once thriving community. Feld Carr wishes she could have rescued more of that heritage. She mourns for those items that remain behind. "Gone," she says of the sefarim lost to us. "There is no way of getting them out."

But a small yet significant part of the Syrian chapter of Jewish history lives on in the hundreds of texts, the Keter and the sifrei Torah that Feld Carr did rescue. The small black letters on parchment or paper are part of our heritage, our history, our lives. We are, and will always be, the people of the book.

Opinions

Not everything is in the book

By Jennifer Fox in Halifax

The Ancient Greeks said, "Know thyself." John Calvin believed all human souls were predestined for heaven or hell. And the Jews thought... well ...I'm not really sure; it wasn't covered in the lecture.

The Foundation Year Programme, or FYP (rhymes with hip), is a specialized course combining English, history, philosophy and sociology – an overview of western thought starting in the Ancient World, ending with post-modernism – and mandatory for all first year King's College journalism students.

FYP has lectures and tutorials four times a week. It has 15 tortuous minutes known as the oral exam. It has writing styles that contradict everything journalists describe as good writing.

And it teaches about religion. Specifically Christianity. Christian beliefs and writers are the focus of two sections of FYP – the Middle Ages, and the Renaissance and the Reformation.

It makes sense that Christianity takes up one-third of the course. The church did govern the western world for 1,000 years, and today Christian beliefs still influence our society. I understand all that. Still, why does FYP barely cover the Old Testament, as they call it? The creation story, Abraham's covenant with God, Jewish law and the Book of Job. That's it. The Torah gets three lectures, while Dante's Divine Comedy is discussed for two weeks.

Before school started, I was scared to study Christian texts. The majority of the students at King's are Christian. These students would excel because they understood or were familiar with Christian terms and beliefs. I didn't even know the basics – the difference between an Anglican or a Presbyterian, how the church functioned, or anything about the Trinity.

I sat through the tutorials bewildered, but was soon relieved to discover most of the students were as lost as I was. But because the unexplainable ideas were part of their belief system, some Christian students accepted them more readily while I struggled to understand. By the end of the Middle Ages, members of my 13-student tutorial hoped I would never ask for another explanation of the Trinity.

I survived the Middle Ages, but then the Reformation appeared and again I felt disoriented and overwhelmed. According to John Calvin, an important figure in the Protestant reformation, God predestined every human to heaven or hell regardless of their actions while on earth. It didn't make sense to me. People must have a role in where they end up in the hereafter, if there is a hereafter. By thinking this was I contradicting a Jewish belief? What did Jews think about these questions? It was December and essays and exams were weighing me down. I was in no mood to deal with somebody else's religion or to start questioning my own.

Suddenly I realized what bothered me about FYP. Learning about Christian beliefs didn't mean I had to accept them, but I wanted to know what Jewish scholars thought about these same ideas. Surely one rabbi wrote about predestination or the afterlife. There was no one at school to turn to. My FYP tutor admitted he really didn't know much about Judaism. I was surrounded by scholars and not one could answer the questions of a Jewish girl feeling very isolated and too far from home.

Eventually I found someone to answer my questions. I went to see the rabbi at my family's synagogue when I returned to Thornhill for winter break. We talked about predestination. Apparently some Jewish scholars think it exists and others don't. We talked about the afterlife, about what Jews believe and what we don't. It wouldn't be useful when I had to write my next FYP essay, but my mind was at ease. My religious crisis had passed.

Know thyself. The Ancient Greeks got it right. Know who you are, know what's inside you. FYP helped me discover many things, but it couldn't help me know myself as a Jew. I had to look for the answers elsewhere. Not all the important things in life are covered in the curriculum.

Conspiracy, conspiracy!

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Future historians looking back at the end of this century will probably find that we have been "blessed" by quick solutions to complex problems. When we don't quite know how to explain a certain development, we are likely to assume that some secret and evil conspiracy is at work.

The infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion of 100 years ago ascribed war, depression and other misfortunes to a Jewish conspiracy. That thesis has helped to keep anti-Semitism alive and today has become popular reading in the Arab world. How else can one more easily explain the enormous advances that tiny Israel has made?

Another well-known conspiracy theory swirls around the assassination of U.S. president John F. Kennedy. Although a meticulous and thorough investigation by a high level commission found no traces of conspiratorial activity, the assumption remains for many people that some evil agency – probably the FBI – did the dirty deed. Similarly, the murder of Martin Luther King has been ascribed to the same agency, and even the son of the late black leader has now joined the parade of those who believe that King was done in, not by one person, but by the major American investigative agency.

So it was really no surprise when, the other day, I came across an article in a usually level-headed magazine headlined "The Top Ten Censored Stories." The headline itself tells the tale: Since all the examples took place in the United States, it is clear that the electronic as well as the print media must be subject to some secret censorship, finally uncovered by the author of this latest example of revelling in secrecy and conspiracy.

Of the 10 items listed, number 4 attracted me: "U.S. designed and sponsored intelligence apparatus based in New Zealand allows international spy agencies to monitor most of the telephone, e-mail and telex communications carried over the world's communications networks."

Actually, I am relieved that only "most" of these electronic media are being spied upon, and not all. Maybe I am one of the lucky ones who has escaped this intrusion.

To come back to the beginning: The sad part in all of this is the unwillingness of so many people to deal with problems head-on, but instead turn to the easy escape route of presuming a conspiracy of some kind.

This fall, John Glenn, U.S. senator and former astronaut, will return to space. This causes me to recall the moment when Neil Armstrong touched down on the moon and proclaimed: "One small step for man, one giant step for mankind." But are you aware that there is an underground conspiracy theory running through many countries that the Armstrong mission was nothing but a huge make-believe and that the United States, by mounting an elaborate Hollywood production which it pretended was a moon mission, bedazzled the world into believing that the moon had actually been reached? It didn't really happen out there in space, it happened in a studio in California. After all, when it comes to Hollywood, everything is possible.

Religion binds people, places

By Erica Horn in Montreal

Camp Green Lane, Green Lane, P.A. Population: 500 Americans, 30 Canadians.

Reveille. I wake up and unintentionally put on my red sweatpants and white T-shirt. I check the date on my watch and realize it is July 1, Canada Day. At dinner, the Canadians are invited to show allegiance to our country by singing our national anthem.

Winter. When I am in Montreal during the winter, I never explicitly show that I am Canadian the way, for example, I show I am Jewish (i.e. wearing a Magen David around my neck). In all honesty, the only time I have felt the need to show my "Canadianism" was during the famous No rally of October 1995. Until the threat of Quebec's separation from the rest of Canada was actually knocking at the door, being Canadian was as significant as my shoe size.

Summer. Driving along Route 63 from the Philadelphia International Airport in mid-June, I noticed that every house was already garnished with its red and white stripes and 50 stars for July 4. Eager beavers!

1996. When I first arrived at Camp Green Lane in June 1996, the other staff members were surprised that we don't wear parkas in the heat of summer, that we don't live in igloos and that we share many of the same interests. (Jewish geography was our favorite evening activity.) I would always comment on how patriotic everyone in the United States appeared to be. Canadians display more allegiance to Canada while in the United States than we do on our home territory.

Camp. When analyzing the camp atmosphere and the competitive dynamics that exist between Americans and Canadians (such as, we are Canadian; we should be able to play hockey much better than you), it is interesting to note that despite our differences – from our differing levels of patriotism and our Monopoly money, to our accents and pronunciation of words like pasta and pajama, just to name a few, we are all able to find a common bond that unifies us: our religion.

Shabbat. On Friday nights at camp, we file into the dining hall and say the Hamotzi and the blessings over the wine and candles. Later, we gather together for services that are conducted somewhat bilingually, yet predominantly in English. Besides the Shema and the Kaddish, the remainder of the prayers are camp related, such as asking for continued happiness in our summer home and for our camp friends. Wishes such as these are more meaningful than repeatedly reciting your national anthem or pledge of allegiance because they are personalized and applicable to your current daily life. Undoubtedly, "so proudly we hail" or "true patriot love" is far less significant than, "We thank you, O God for our camp family and for what we mean and bring to one another."

Taps. It is comforting to know that no matter where you are, be it Nowheresville, P.A., or even Zimbabwe, religion acts as a binding force that brings people, places and times together.

American culture owes an immense debt of gratitude to George and Ira Gershwin, whose brilliant songs still resonate. Their fecund artistic partnership is portrayed by Deena Rosenberg in Fascinating Rhythm (University of Michigan Press).

You may not know it, but Russian Jewish immigrants established agrarian settlements in the United States in the late 19th century. Ellen Eisenberg examines the topic in Jewish Agricultural Colonies in New Jersey 1882-1920 (Syracuse University Press).

In The Vanishing American Jew (Little, Brown), the prolific Alan Dershowitz offers a bracing analysis of and a putative solution to assimilation. Barry Rubin takes it one step further in Assimilation and Discontents (Random House), a lively analysis of its temptations and traps.

Historians and sociologists have studied Montreal Jewry with a fine tooth comb. Mackay Smith's Jews of Montreal and their Judaisms (Aaron Communications) glosses over its surface.

The life of Montreal-born poet, novelist and balladeer Leonard Cohen is aptly summed up by Ira Nadel in Various Positions (Pantheon).

Mark, Jan, Boris and Clement Hambourg contributed much to the Canadian musical scene. And in The Brothers Hambourg (Robin Brass), Eric Koch traces the trajectory of their respective careers.

The story of Meyer Rothschild, the financier, is felicitously told by Amos Elon in Founder (Penguin). And in The Golden Tradition (Syracuse University Press), Lucy Dawidowicz writes authoritatively of Jewish life and thought in Eastern Europe from the 16th century to 1939.

The collapse of the Soviet Union had an unimaginable impact on Jews and on Israel. In After Gorbachev (The Jewish Agency), Baruch Gur-Gurevitz, an Israeli specialist, describes the process that led to a new wave of aliyah to Israel.

Isaac Babel's 1920 Diary (Yale University Press) vividly recounts his tumultuous experiences during the Soviet Union's war with Poland, a conflict which had adverse effects on Jews in the Ukraine and eastern Poland.

Isaac Vogelfanger, a young Jewish doctor from Lvov, joined the Red Army in 1941. Not long afterward, he was arrested as an "enemy" of the state, and packed off to a series of brutal prison camps. In Red Tempest: The Life of a Surgeon in the Gulag (McGill-Queen's University Press), he recounts his bleak encounter with paranoiac Stalinism.

When World War II broke out, more than 250,000 Polish Jews fled to the Soviet Union. Samuel Honig of Cracow was one of them, and in From Poland to Russia and Back (Black Moss Press), he tells of his amazing odyssey.

The memoirs of Holocaust survivors and victims continue to pour off the presses.

The Diary of David Sierakowiak (Oxford University Press), based on five notebooks found in the Lodz ghetto, burns into the soul. Memoirs From Occupied Warsaw 1940-1945 (Valentine Mitchell), by Helena Szereszewska, adds to our knowledge of the Nazi ghetto system, as does Arthur Schaller's 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka (Raincoast Books).

Further valuable eyewitness reminiscences of the Holocaust are And Peace Never Came (Wilfrid Laurier University Press) by Elisabeth Raab, a Hungarian Jew; Fragments: Memories of a Wartime Childhood (Random House) by Binjamin Wilkomirski, a Latvian Jew; and We're Alive: And Life Goes On (Fitzhenry & Whiteside) by Eva Roubickova, a Bohemian Jew.

Virtually every Holocaust memoir to be published was written years or decades after the war. Fresh Wounds (University of North Carolina Press), edited by Donald Niewyk, breaks new ground, being a compelling compendium of survivors' testimony compiled by an American psychologist in 1946.

Women in the Holocaust (Yale University Press) is billed as the first book of original scholarship on this topic. The editors are Dalia Ofer and Lenore Weitzman.

Hidden History of the Kovno Ghetto (Little, Brown), issued by the United States Holocaust memorial Museum in Washington, is a lavishly illustrated work which enhances one's understanding of the Holocaust in Lithuania.

Martin Gilbert, the distinguished British scholar, painstakingly describes sites associated with Jewish history, before and during World War II, in Holocaust Journey (Douglas & McIntyre).

Auschwitz 1270 to the Present (W.W. Norton) is doubtless a definitive work. The authors are Deborah Dwork and Robert Jan Van Pelt.

The wellsprings of anti-Semitism run deep, as the following books prove:

Esau's Tears: Modern Anti-Semitism and the Rise of the Jews (University of California Press), by Albert Lindemann, explores its emergence from the 1700s onward. Gavin Langmuir's Toward A Definition of Anti-Semitism (University of California Press) concentrates on the medieval and pre-medieval eras. Robert Chazan's complementary volume, Medieval Stereotypes and Modern Anti-Semitism (University of California Press), turns on the 12th century.

Peter Schafter, in Judeophobia: Attitudes Toward The Jews in the Ancient World (Harvard University Press), explores anti-Semitism through the eyes of the Greeks and the Romans. The Singular Beast: Jews, Christians & the Pig (Columbia University Press), by Claudine Fabre-Vassas, deftly examines the role of the pig in the convoluted relationship between Judaism and Christianity. Binjamin Segel, in A Lie and a Libel (University of Nebraska Press), reveals the face of that notorious anti-Jewish forgery, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Alain Finkelkraut's The Imaginary Jew (University of Nebraska Press) is a provocative take on anti-Semitism, Marxism, Israeli foreign policy and Yiddish culture. Constructions of 'the Jew' in English Literature and Society (Cambridge University Press), by Bryan Cheyette, examines Jews as racial types in the works of writers from Anthony Trollope to James Joyce. In a dense, magisterial book, The Anatomy of Prejudice (Harvard University Press), Elisabeth Young-Bruehl surveys racism since 1945.

Stuart Svonkin, in Jews Against Prejudice (Columbia University Press), looks at the struggle by American Jewish organizations in the 1940s and 1950s to combat bigotry and advance civil rights. Auschwitz and After: Race, Culture and 'the Jewish Question' in France (Routledge, Chapman Hall) sheds new light on a perennial subject. It is edited by Lawrence Kritzman.

Three more books about Hitler. The Making of Adolf Hitler (University of Missouri Press) by Eugene Davidson; Explaining Hitler (Random House) by Ron Rosenbaum; and Hitler's Thirty Days to Power January 1933 (Addison-Wesley) by Henry Ashby Turner, Jr. delve into the mind of a demon and rigorously analyze the events which propelled him to power and led to Nazi Germany's ignominious downfall.

Readers who admire Cynthia Ozick will be pleased to learn that Syracuse University Press has released several of her critically-acclaimed works of non-fiction. They are Bloodshed, Levitation, The Cannibali Galaxy and The Pagan Rabbi.

The third and newest edition of Ephraim Katz's 1506-page The Film Encylopedia (HarperCollins) is out. As you peruse the entries, you quickly realize that the movie industry would not be what it is without its legion of Jewish producers, directors, screenwriters and actors.

Books derive insights from the Talmud

The Kabbalah of Envy*, by Rabbi Nilton Bonder (Random House, $25).
The Kabbalah of Food*, by Rabbi Bonder (Random House, $25).
The Kabbalah of Money*, by Rabbi Nilton Bonder (Random House, $25).

The Kabbalah, the medieval tradition of Jewish mysticism, is now fashionable and chic. It is being taught – usually at a price – by self-designated gurus all over North America. Hollywood and rock stars now embrace the insights and revelations of the Zohar – the prime book of Jewish mysticism – written in Aramaic in the 13th century by the Spanish sage, Moses de Leon.

In Los Angeles, Barbara Streisand, Roseanne, Elizabeth Taylor and others are all eager students of this arcane and esoteric form of knowledge. Jewish tradition insists that prior to meditation in Kabbalah one has to be a mature and serious student and have a good grasp of classic Jewish texts. With little or no knowledge of Judaism, it is a travesty to approach this difficult subject matter as a quick guide to wisdom, serenity or success. Men and women who don't know the letters of the Hebrew alphabet are ready to become instant mystics.

It should be pointed out that an emphasis on mystical study can lead one away from the traditions of Judaism. It may result in the desire for private rather than communal involvement, and in a tendency toward pantheism, the non-Jewish belief that God is coterminous with nature. It can result in a diminution of ethical responsibility as longing for divine contact becomes more important than the righteous deed. It also feeds a tendency toward the occult and the "spirit" world of demons, angels and visionary beings of every kind, and is prone to merge Jewish mystical ideas with those of other religious and cultures. In all of this, much of what is unique and singular in Judaism is lost.

The three slender volumes under review, the work of a Brazilian rabbi, have little to do with Kabbalah despite their titles. They are helpful and down-to-earth and derive their insights from the wisdom of the Talmud and medieval commentators, as well as from chassidic tales and some mystical lore. The author also brings telling lessons from his own personal experiences as rabbi and teacher.

The Kabbalah of Envy is concerned with how to transform feelings of hatred, anger and other negative emotions into paths of serenity and inner growth.

The Kabbalah of Money takes a broad and ethical view of all kinds of economic behavior, from how we spend our money or give charity, to how we fulfil our role as consumers in a global economic framework.

The Kabbalah of Food, which includes a section from the Kitzur Shulohan Aruch, a 16th century rabbinical treatise, entitled Rules Concerning Physical Well Being, touches on all aspects of food: How to eat consciously with ecological awareness, the inner meaning of religious customs and laws concerning food, and overweight as an emotional, spiritual and moral problem.

Gaining a sense of mission

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Jewish genealogy, says the acclaimed author-genealogist Arthur Kurzweil, "is a spiritual pursuit whether we know it or not."

The keynote speaker at last month's Summer Seminar of Jewish Genealogy in Los Angeles, Kurzweil seemed even more eloquent than usual on the subject for which he is best known, a subject that he presents with a passion.

"I think our mission as Jewish genealogists is the most important mission in the Jewish community today," the New Jersey resident told an assembly of about 700 people. "We have the opportunity to do what no other group of Jews can do.

"We are able to bring unity to the Jewish community. What we as Jewish genealogists are doing is healing the family."

Kurzweil, who became an Orthodox Jew after researching his own extensive family tree, knows from experience that a single family tree can and often does contain every type of Jew from secular to chassidic, Ashkenazi egalitarian to Sephardi Orthodox. Charting our family trees reminds us of both the astonishing diversity and the unity of the Jewish people.

It has been roughly 30 years since Kurzweil wandered into the Jewish Division of the New York Public Library to search the card catalogue for references to the Galician shtetl of Dobromil, where his father and numerous ancestors had lived. He had heard enough family legends and stories about the town over his lifetime that Dobromil had attained robust and romantic substance in his imagination. But he knew that few outsiders had ever heard of the place and he did not expect to find anything in the library catalogue.

As he recalled in his bestselling book, From Generation to Generation: How to Trace Your Jewish Genealogy and Family History, Kurzweil was astonished to find an index card referring to the town's memorial book. He was even more astonished after a librarian retrieved the volume and he began flipping through its more than 500 pages.

"Turning to the first page, a full-page photograph, I read the caption: 'Main Street in Dobromil.' There is no way for me to know how many minutes I sat staring at the picture. The photograph showed an unpaved road, several small buildings with slanted roofs, and a few people on the street. No one will believe that the picture was familiar to me, but in fact I had imagined it just this way."

As Kurzweil suggested in his lecture, making such connections is one of the rewards of genealogy. We need to discover the hidden ties that bind us to our Jewish past, he said.

After the unprecedented devastation of the Shoah, Jews have a moral imperative to retrieve the pieces of our collective heritage and history, according to Kurzweil, who has emerged as a sort of spiritual guru to the Jewish genealogical community.

"The Talmud says that when the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed, they did their family trees," he said. "Sometimes the best way to go forward is to go backwards. We are a rebuilding generation. And one of the ways the Talmud tells us to rebuild is to do our family trees."

If Kurzweil, who is vice-president of the Judaic publishing house, Jason Aronson Inc., restrained his missionary zeal during the talk, it was because he knew that he was already preaching to the converted. Jewish genealogy, he seemed to be saying, is more than a bookish hobby for the pedantically inclined: it is an essential healing ritual for a historic people still engulfed in an abyss of despair half a century after a crippling devastation.

The L.A. conference featured many speakers who shared Kurzweil's passion for Jewish genealogy. Collectively, they gave the impression that there has been a groundswell of popular support for this once-lonely pastime, that awareness of the importance of Jewish genealogy is mushrooming across the Jewish world.

More about the L.A. Summer Seminar and some of its other extraordinary speakers in a future column.

Sephardi renaissance

By AVI BENLOLO

After decades of inertia, a renewed sense of Sephardi cultural pride is emerging. Sephardi communities in Israel and throughout the world are beginning to reignite their colorful and vibrant culture through artistic, scientific and political forms of expression.

Sephardim are Jews whose roots lie in the lands of the Mediterranean and western Asia. In the strictest sense, Sephardim lived in the Iberian Peninsula, most particularly in Spain, from the second and first centuries BCE until their expulsion in 1492. By the 12th century, Spain was recognized by most of the Jewish world as a significant spiritual and intellectual centre. Maimonides (1135-1204), for example, was heavily influenced by Spain's scholarly environment.

Many Spanish Jews were at the top echelons of the empire, serving in the kings' courts as astronomers, scribes, linguists and aides. The top financial advisor to Queen Isabella and King Ferdinand was Isaac Abravanel, who desperately tried to convince the king and queen not to carry out the expulsion decree, but to no avail.

Forced conversions and the expulsion of Jews not willing to convert to Christianity fragmented Spanish Jewry and dispersed it to neighboring countries. With few exceptions in the Ottoman Empire and Holland, Spanish Jews never recovered the magnitude of their social, political and intellectual impact on Spain in any other nation in the Diaspora to which they fled.

Israel's Independence in 1948 renewed the hope and desire among local and Diaspora Sephardim of achieving social, cultural and religious freedom. This culminated in massive waves of immigration to the fledgling state over the next three decades.

However, it was only in the late 1970s that Sephardim started to change their political and social position in Israeli society. Political analysts view the 1977 election of Menachem Begin and the Likud party as a turning point for the Sephardim in Israel. They argue it was the massive force of the Sephardi vote that brought Begin into power.

Thus began the Sephardi renaissance in Israel. Although Sephardim today comprise the largest population in development towns, they can be found at all levels of Israeli society, including the arts, education, business, science, defence and most notably, government. Some Sephardi politicians currently serving are David Levy, Meir Shitreet, Shlomo Benami, Yitzhak Mordechai, Aryeh Deri, Rafi Alloul, Shlomo Benziri and Itzhak Levi.

The renaissance has spread to the Diaspora too. Major Sephardi communities in Paris, Los Angeles, New York, Seattle, Toronto and Montreal have developed significant community structures, including synagogues, schools, yeshivot and associations such as the World Sephardi Federation and the Sephardi Education Centre, the latter of which caters to young adults at an international level.

In Morocco, for example, the current financial counsellor to King Hassan II is Andre Azoulay, a Jewish leader whose prominence is reflected by his position in the king's immediate circle.

Sephardim in the Diaspora are shifting their focus from being insular to developing leadership in Jewish federations and other major communal organizations, with a view to achieving more balanced communities.

Sephardim are once again beginning to feel confidence and pride about their culture. Many no longer feel inhibited by their social environment and they are eagerly identifying and expressing themselves for who they are – Sephardim.

Music comes to life

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we began to look at (and listen to) the captivating sounds of Sephardi and Mizrachi music. Today we continue by focussing on the groups and individuals who have breathed new life into this music.

The Israel Andalusian Orchestra recorded its first CD last year [http://andalorchisra.com/]. That feat is remarkable when you consider the challenges faced by the lovers of this music. Andalusian music arrived in Israel with the immigrants from North Africa in the late '50s and early '60s. However, due to the difficulties with their absorption, these new immigrants came close to losing their rich and ancient music.

Although there was a cultural revival in the late '70s, the lack of trained musicians and transcribed music posed more challenges to Andalusian music. Recently an orchestra was formed and an album was produced. You can hear six samples of their work with titles like Quddam Istihilall and Insiraf Men-Quddam Al-Maya [http://andalorchisra.com/recordin.html].

The Renanot Institute for Jewish Music [http://www.renanot.co.il/] is also working to rescue Jewish musical traditions from being lost. At the moment, the Jerusalem-based Institute is concentrating on music from Persia, Afghanistan, India, Morocco and Buchara. You can listen to the fruit of their labors at [http://www.renanot.co.il/live.htm].

You'll hear everything from rarely heard tunes to familiar titles such as Had Gadya and Ehad Mi Yode'a to Ladino songs such as Cuando El Rey Nimro, Arvolicos D'Almandra. While you're at this site, you can also click to listen to a few words in Haketia, a form of Ladino spoken in Tangiers in northern Morocco. Elzam's work can also be sampled at the BSZNet: Hall of Music [http://bsz.org/music.htm]. While there, listen in to the singing of Chazzan David Shiro as he sings music in the Syrian tradition. And for more in Ladino, there's The LadinoStalgia choir of Jerusalem [http://www.geocities.com/Broadway/7140/].

Yes there are other ways to sing Ein K'elokenu. To hear how it was sung in Casablanca, go to the Moroccan Tunes page which focuses on Shabbat and holiday music [http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/1717/Music.html].

And if you have a free hour, you may want to spend it listening to the liturgical hymns or pizmonim of Syrian Jews [http://www.613.org/music/pizmon/piz.html].

Actually, I prefer the alternate title of this Web site: Hear how Jews have Sung to God for the Past 1,000 or so Years.

One technical note: Most of the audio sites we are visiting make use of the free RealPlayer program [http://www.real.com/products/player/download_player.html]. Even if you already have RealPlayer installed, make sure you have the most recent version. In addition to RealPlayer, online sounds may be delivered in other formats such as Macromedia Shockwave [http://www.macromedia.com/shockwave/download/] and Apple Quicktime [http://www.apple.com/quicktime/download/index.html]. I recommend downloading both of these programs.

Next week, we'll conclude our musical trek by focussing on the warmth and vitality of Sephardi and Mizrachi love songs.

Yiddish programs recieve major donations

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A love of the Yiddish language as a way of returning to their roots and encouraging young people to take an interest in it has inspired two Toronto women to donate substantial amounts to the Yiddish classes at the University of Toronto .

On behalf of the Zukerman Family Foundation, Helen Zukerman contributed a "challenge" grant of $33,000, while Rosalie Sharp accepted the "challenge" and donated $10,000 to make sure a matching amount was raised.

"Nobody wants to be first, which is why we agreed to make a donation if it could be matched," said Zukerman.

The grants ensure the continuation of the Yiddish classes in the School of Jewish Studies at the university for another year, while the future of the program is bright, according to Bayla Chaikoff, Yiddish committee liaison with the university.

"A lot of young people are interested in Yiddish as a way of recovering their roots," said Chaikoff. "It's a healthy development because they are singing Yiddish songs and digging into their history.

"And there coudn't be a better time for this activity than at the beginning of the university year, when students are considering their courses."

A total of 20 students were enrolled in the first year Yiddish class last year, considered a high number for a second language.

Growing up Jewish in Toronto and her affection for the language of her childhood led Sharp to support the U of T Yiddish program.

For Zukerman, who came to Toronto from Montreal, one of the inspirations was meeting an Orthodox woman in Israel whose children spoke Yiddish to each other and to their mother.

Sharp, wife of Four Seasons Hotel owner Isadore Sharp, has taken a few private lessons to refresh her memory of the language she grew up with, and she intends to take more "when I get a break. I'm afraid I've taken on one project too many."

She said she can speak Yiddish a little and can understand it well, particularly "street language" Yiddish.

Zukerman, whose late husband Barry was a Yiddishist, is founder of the Jewish Film Festival and is active in other Jewish causes.

"Yiddish is the root of our culture," she said.

Genesis 22 explores role of human autonomy

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

Does Judaism preach blind loyalty to a higher authority, or is there room for human autonomy and creativity? Variations of this question often arise in the classroom, and all roads eventually lead to Genesis 22, where Abraham is commanded to bring Isaac to Mount Moriah and sacrifice him upon an altar.

Although an angel of God stops Abraham before he can complete the task, the incident is still startling and disturbing. Known as the Akedah, the binding of Isaac, this is one of the central stories of the Bible, and it has provoked a great deal of later Jewish commentary regarding the duty of humankind towards God.

How can God command something as patently unethical as child sacrifice, something not only abhorrent to humanistic notions of ethics, but even specifically prohibited by the Torah itself as one of the abominable practices of the ancient pagans? What is the Torah teaching us by narrating this event?

The story gives rise to the perpetual debate in society over who or what determines the criteria upon which we base our ideas of morality. Perhaps the test that Abraham is given — for indeed the Torah states that "God tested Abraham" (Genesis 22:1) — is so harsh precisely to indicate that not all of God's activities are perceivable and readily understandable by human intelligence, nor should they be.

This point of view would assert that the whole essence of a deity is that His commandments may at times evade human reason, for He is on a level that occasionally transcends the human capacity to understand. One of the difficulties of this position, of course, is that it allows for a completely irrational and arbitrary God, one who could command immoral activities at will.

A different perspective would argue that Abraham erred greatly in not paying attention to the call of reason that should have persuaded him to reject the voice in his ear telling him to sacrifice his son. Such a position is put in its most strident form by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant. For Kant, God is always subject to the evaluation of human reason. Hence, Abraham should have stood his ground and resisted the command of God to sacrifice Isaac.

Other philosophers, such as Jean-Paul Sartre, focus on a different aspect of the story – its oddness in a modern context. What, for instance would occur, if someone in our day and age "heard" a similar command in his ear? Would we call it an act of piety or a sign of psychosis? Any cursory glance at the media shows that such an incident is not theoretical but happens with almost mundane frequency.

Trust in God, in the face of ostensible injustice and even a world that seems random and cruel, is always one of the main challenges to a religious faith. This quality of trust is embodied in the example of Abraham, who is willing to give of all he has in an effort to satisfy the divine will. The midrash portrays Abraham, not as an unthinking zombie in this affair, but as a man gripped by complex emotions – duty to God, love of his son, self-doubt about the whole enterprise.

Ultimately, however, his belief in a wisdom that transcends his own is the key factor in Abraham's mind; he has profoundly internalized the concept that the Jewish idea of the moral begins and ends with God, and that this idea may even be more important than human life itself.

It's tough to say goodbye

By SUSAN BERRIN

Guest Voices

Today is one of those gor-geous summer days in Vic-toria. The sun shines and a slight breeze kisses the first tall poppies. I'm saying goodbye to my garden. While pulling a few weeds and digging up bulbs to replant at my new house (address unknown), I'm walking through the beds saying goodbyé to many fond memories.

We're leaving Victoria in just weeks and I'm flooded with sounds of laughter and scenes of friendship in this lovely yard.

I'm writing this now so that I can reread it if I am ever crazy enough to consider moving again. The thought of saying goodbye again should be enough to halt any future thoughts of uprooting. The goodbyes have been arduous – the formal farewells and the informal hugs; the sense of knowing that some of these folk will not be here when we return to visit, the old and frail, who are getting on in their lifespan.

Most of our friends have sup-ported our plans to move. They know that the decision to leave Vic-toria after 16 years as the rabbinic family is a decision to provide a fuller Jewish environment for our children. Leaving Victoria is only a consequence of our need to find Jewish schools and peer support for our family. It is not a statement about the wonderful people of this town and this warm and caring Jewish community.

And if the goodbyes tug at the heartstrings, the packing is pulling at the hamstrings. An archeologist could study the layers of our lives by the boxes in our basement: years of babies and children; a stint as journalist; the pottery phase and the photography craze; boating para-phernalia and camping gear.

Friends have volunteered to help. The easy packing, the "I don't have to weed through this" packing, can be handed over: Pesach dishes and Shabbat dishes; over a ton of books. We're packing the Jewish ritual objects that of course must accompany us: dozens of kippot and benchers; several challah plates and kiddush cups; the numerous challah cloths our children made in Hebrew school; our sukkah – made of particleboard with arched windows and a lattice-work roof to hold the s'chach, the boughs of greenery – which is large enough for a table of 10. The sukkah has been an ongoing project for years, my husband-the-rabbi's therapeu-tic release after the gruelling weeks of preparing High Holy Day sermons. How could we leave behind this sukkah, this symbol of life's fragility, of our wandering, of making our home wherever we find ourselves?

We have the moving company booked and the children enrolled in Jewish day schools. We have not yet sold our house. We do not have an address to which to send our be-longings. And only half the earners have employment to make all of these plans possible.

God set before Abraham a series of tests. Some, like the binding of Isaac, are well known. Others are more obscure. Last fall, when my husband and I read the Torah portion, Lech Lecha, the story of Abraham and Sarah being called to leave their land and journey to an unknown destination (this calling was the first of Abraham's "tests of faith"), we read and reread the passage. We listened intently to the words and we felt deeply the message.

And while we do not always read Torah as though it was written directly for us, we realized that this year, this passage was our calling. It was time to journey forth from Victoria, from the comfort and community we have called home for many years. It was time to es-tablish ourselves in a community that could nourish our children from the deep wells of Jewish learning and living.

We anticipated that the leaving would be difficult. But we had no clue about the tests of faith that would await us: Employment op-portunities beckoned and then faded; potential buyers for our house wandered through it and looked elsewhere; housing prices soared in our Boston neighborhood of choice; the Canadian dollar was devalued to its lowest point ever.

Some people would call us naive. Others might feel we're stub-born, unwilling to spend another year in our home or relocate to Montreal or Phoenix or another city with a strong Jewish communal in-frastructure. But we see this as a test of faith, as belief in a dream we continue to believe in.

We promised our children we would return them to the schools of their choice, to the education they found riveting during a year's sab-batical in Boston, to the friends that welcomed them, to a community they and we could grow in. We just keep believing that this dream will become a reality soon. And hope-fully without too many more nail-biting days and sleepless nights.

In our contemporary world, dreaming has been banished to the night hours. There is so little op-portunity to live with faith. And al-though I'm ready for this "test" to be over, ready for all the puzzle pieces to fall neatly into their places, I have relished in some small way the journey we have em-barked upon.

Life is rarely a straight path, and the byways we're travelling these days are emotionally scenic and strengthening. Each time I sing Adon Olam, the last verses linger on my tongue, "God is with me and I will not be afraid."

Susan Berrin will be a Guest Voice from time to time, chronicling her family's move from Victoria, B.C., to Boston.

Community Matters

Participants Love Yachdav

Torontonians made their mark on this year's Yachdav 50 Young Leadership Conference, sponsored by UJA Federations around the world. Thirty eight Toronto participants - nearly 20% of the entire group - joined more than 200 others from several continents in Kiev and Israel.

The conference focused on four topics: aliyah, the peace process, the status of minorities in Israel, and Israel-Diaspora relations. Among the highlights was an evening featuring former Prime Minister Shimon Peres; a Jewish Agency fact finding day; a first-hand view of several agency projects, supported by the worldwide UJA Federation movement; and a tour of Tzfat, known for its mysticism and spirituality.

Needing Each Other

Being given the opportunity to be part of Yachdav will go down as one of the highlights of my life. It had a significant impact in three areas: spiritual, intellectual and social. The spiritual element surfaced by spending Shabbat in dramatically different environments, first in Kiev and then in Jerusalem. Shabbat in Kiev offered an opportunity to attend a shul that had been used as a municipal puppet theatre during the Communist era and was only recently reclaimed by the local community. At Babi Yar, we lit candles in memory of several hundred thousand Jews who were murdered there during World War II. The reality and closeness imposed an extremely chilling effect on all of us. On our last day in Kiev, we were hosted by local Jewish families. They opened their homes, sharing the stress and anxiety they are experiencing as a result of sending their children to Israel to make a better life. We were able to understand their fight for survival and the necessity of support from world Jewry. The trip provided a continuous array of intellectual challenges and a battle with complex issues, including Who is a Jew, assimilation in Israel and peace in the Middle East. We were continually bombarded by opposing political and religious viewpoints. There are no simple answers to questions of peace and religion in Israel. We walked away with lots of questions. Equally exciting was the social aspect, enhanced by the group's diversity. There were people from almost every walk of life, including a cardiologist from Sao Paulo, a lawyer from London, a gem trader from Sydney and a banker from Geneva. Although we did not agree on a solution to all the challenges, we agreed that Israel and the Diaspora are mutually dependent for the continued growth and prosperity of Jewish life.

Historic Connections

As I reflect back on my first Yachdav mission to Kiev and Israel, a few highlights stand out. We toured the Chesed Centre, established to care for poor, elderly Jews in Kiev and it truly touched me to see Jews looking out for one another in such a warm and dedicated outreach program. At the Peace Dinner, where Shimon Peres delivered an eloquent address about his vision of peace for the future of the Middle East, I looked around the room and saw the faces of tomorrow's Jewish leaders from 21 countries around the world. As we listened to two immigrants - one a young Ethiopian woman and another, the daughter of a righteous Gentile from Sarajevo - their captivating stories reminded me that, as Jews, we never forget our brothers and sisters around the world. When we walked around Canada Centre in Metulla (built by UJA Federation donors), we saw how the generosity of one community enriched the lives and boosted the morale of thousands who live close to the northern border. The 225 members of our group come from different countries and cultures and speak different languages, yet, as Jews, we are all connected in our hearts to one another. Together we can make the world a better place in which to live. Yachdav.

Volunteer Coordinators Conference

Fifteen community professionals responsible for developing and placing volunteers recently led by example when they contributed their own time at a special volunteer coordinators workshop.

Held at Camp Reena, the day-long session, sponsored by UJA Federation, focused on community service as a prerequisite for high school graduation. Ontario's Ministry of Education is ready to make completion of a community service course compulsory, starting on January 1, 1999. The coordinators discussed how to deal with an influx of young volunteers as a result of the new provincial requirement.

The workshop, which also included a representative from the Community Hebrew of Academy of Toronto (CHAT), which pioneered a community service education component, was facilitated by Syrelle Bernstein, Director of Volunteers at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Anyone interested in community volunteer opportunities should contact Shelly Rotman at UJA Federation, (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

Monuments toppled at Montreal cemetery

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The toppling in a north-end Jewish cemetery of 43 monuments in an apparent act of vandalism could have been prevented, said funeral director Laurence Paperman.

The community has allowed the cemetery to deteriorate to the point that its obvious neglect is an invitation to this kind of criminal act, said Paperman, who has been behind the effort to raise money to fix up the cemetery.

There were no signs of an anti-Semitic motive. The most distressing thing about the incident is that it has worsened the "deplorable" condition of much of the cemetery, where "a few hundred" monuments are now down but there are few funds to set them right, Paperman said. The rest are believed to have fallen over on their own, mainly due to deterioration through aging.

All the 43 monuments are believed to have gone down overnight on a weekend. The incident was reported by a neighbor.

Memorial Gardens, better known as the Back River Cemetery, is located at the busy intersection of Sauve and Berri streets, just across from a metro station. It is owned by nine affiliated congregations and mutual-aid societies, some of which exist only on paper or have few members today, and has about 7,000 plots, of which at least 90 percent are occupied, Paperman thinks. "We do about 30 burials a year there now."

Congregation Chevra Kadisha-B'nai Jacob has the largest section, holding about 45 percent of the land, Paperman said.

It's one of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in Montreal. There are either no surviving descendants in Montreal of those buried there or survivors are no longer in Montreal or are too many generations removed to take an interest. Some graves date back to the turn of the century.

The land was originally bought by Temple Emanu-El in 1883, said historian Allan Raymond, but was subdivided and sold or donated to smaller groups in 1890, when the temple found the land too swampy and the site too far from downtown.

Paperman said all of the 43 stones were located in the King Edward Sick Benefit Society section, near the gate on the St. Denis Street side. The King Edward is one of the affiliates that has virtually disappeared and only a few families maintain individual plots.

Most of the downed monuments are decades old, and righting them could cost $1,000 each, Paperman said, because their crooked foundations need re-positioning as well.

The cemetery had no joint perpetual care fund, until the Memorial Gardens Foundation was launched about five years ago, at Paperman's urging. Despite a determined fund drive in the Jewish community at large, as well as among the families of those buried there, under $200,000 was raised. Paperman said at least $1.5 million is needed.

If that money was in hand, Paperman said $500,000 would be spent on immediate repairs to the monuments, to the paths and benches. Lights and a washroom would be installed, and walls and fencing would be improved. Some of the money raised has already been spent on a section of the wall, Paperman said, because the city had warned it was a danger to the public.

The remaining $1 million would be set aside for maintenance, he said.

Paperman believes the Back River Cemetery should be the concern of the entire Jewish community, not just those with family there, and that it is a shame the response has been so poor.

"North American Jews are spending all kinds of money to save Jewish cemeteries in Europe, yet here is one in our own backyard that is being abandoned," he said.

Paperman said he has obtained "an agreement in principle" from FEDERATION CJA that the Back River is a "long-term community responsibility" but that has not translated into any funding commitment. He would like to see some sort of integration of the Back River with the community's Baron de Hirsch Cemetery on de la Savane Road, which is well endowed.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) condemned the act in the strongest terms. "Any violation of the sanctity of cemetery property of any faith denominations is despicable. It is also painful for the families whose loved ones have been laid to rest. Regrettably, this is not the first time our community has dealt with such incidents," said Dorothy Zalcman Howard, CJC Quebec region chair.

This the first vandalism in a Jewish cemetery in Montreal in a few years, as far as Robert Libman, regional director of B'nai Brith Canada, knows. "I would not call this an anti-Semitic act per se. The police have told us that some Christian cemeteries in the area also recently had some monuments turned over."

Ontario students take part in CJC region kallah

ORANGEVILLE, Ont. — Thirty-nine youngsters from across the province came together at Camp Reena recently to participate in the fifth cycle of the three-year High School Outreach Program of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

The weekend kallah (retreat) enabled alumni from the previous three-year cycle to meet with those just beginning their studies.

For the 18 alumni, it was their first meeting since last summer's five weeks of study and travel in Israel. For current participants, it was an opportunity to mingle with older teenagers living in small communities and ask them about their outreach program experiences.

Jared Raab, 13, of Milbrook (near Peterborough), whose brother Dustin is an Outreach alumnus, said what he found most interesting was talking to other Jews his age.

"It was wonderful to talk about Passover and Chanukah instead of discussing Christmas with my schoolmates. Also, [the Shabbat] services were more meaningful and relevant because they were conducted in English," Raab said.

The retreat's Shabbat program focused on deriving more spiritual value from religious services, said CJC outreach coordinator Leanne Rosen. "Many wanted to concentrate on the meaning behind prayer and how the parshat hashavuah relates to their lives as teenagers," she said.

On Saturday, CJC's new director of community services and youth activities, Michael Soberman, addressed alumni while new students took part in programs and games based on Jewish history.

As well, Erik Petersiel, director of education at Shaarei Beth El Congregation in Oakville, spoke on The Importance of Jewish History, or Why We Take the Time to Study Something 2,000 Years Old, and on Saturday evening, alumni discussed their Israel experiences and answered students' questions.

On the first night, both groups attended a joint program on Jewish identity led by Rosen. The aim was to enhance the alumni's experiences and provide a firm foundation for the newcomers' next three years of study, Rosen said.

Rosen said the current group was "very enthusiastic about learning. There were suggestions for improving future retreats…As for the alumni, it touched me to see how close they have become as a group and how they remain in close contact."

Alumnus Sarah Chalmers, 17, of Peterborough spoke of her positive experiences in the program, "such as having nice Jewish friends, being with people who understand what it's like to grow up in a small town as a Jew, and going to Israel, which was amazing because we were part of a majority."

Winnipeg shul rededicated

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Recently, the members of Winnipeg Beach's only synagogue held a special kiddush to rededicate the nearly 50-year-old shul at its new location on the grounds of Camp Massad.

"We are pleased that the future of our synagogue is now secure," says Laurie Mainster, a longtime active member. "This benefits Camp Massad as well. How many other Jewish camps in North America have active synagogues on site?"

The resort communities of Winnipeg Beach and Gimli just to the north have long been favorite spots for Jewish summer cottagers. They are located on the west side of Lake Winnipeg about a 45-minute drive north of Winnipeg.

The Beach Shul was opened in 1950. Although initially the Orthodox synagogue had daily minyans throughout the summer, in the past few years the congregation has only come together for Friday evening and Saturday morning services through July and August.

"It is difficult sustaining minyans," Mainster says, "because many people only come to their cottage for a couple of weeks in the summer or on weekends. We have about two dozen semi-regulars."

Two years ago, the synagogue membership turned ownership of the synagogue over to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to prepare for the eventuality that one day there may be no one left to support it. In that case, the foundation would be able to sell the building and use the money to set up a trust fund for undesignated causes.

The decision to move the synagogue to Camp Massad – just north of Winnipeg Beach – was made by the membership in the spring as a result of a 2-year-old bylaw requiring all buildings at Winnipeg Beach to install indoor plumbing.

Although the bylaw was introduced two years ago, the synagogue members ignored it because they didn't think it would pose a problem for the synagogue, Mainster says. "When we were threatened with legal action and possible eviction if we didn't comply, we pointed out that we only use the building eight times a year," he says. "We argued that we should be exempted from the bylaw. We also tried to suggest our building receive an historic designation. We were turned down."

After looking into the cost of installing sewer and water works, the congregation members decided instead to approach Camp Massad about moving the building there and incorporating it in the camp program. Camp Massad was quite receptive, Mainster says.

The move was made at the beginning of July. The shul was also renovated with a new, wheelchair accessible entrance and a fresh coat of paint on the outside. The Jewish Foundation contributed half of the $10,000 for the move and renovations while synagogue members contributed the rest.

Mainster reports that Camp Massad is already using the synagogue for programs during the week.

"This is a terrific location for us," says Mainster. "We will carry on with services as long as we can. As long as Camp Massad exists, our synagogue is secure."

New Keren Hayesod shlichah favors personal touch

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The new Keren Hayesod shlichah to British Columbia's Lower Mainland says computerization interferes with social interaction, and it's a problem she'd like to solve.

"You need to get to know people personally, to reach out and touch them," explains Dina Wachtel. "It's not enough just to go on the Internet or read books."

She'll have plenty of opportunity over the next two years to put her philosophy into action as part of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) team.

Her main duties with Federation, she said in a recent interview, will be to take part in the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) fundraising campaign and act as a bridge between Israel and Canada by making presentations about Israel to the local community.

"I see myself as a goodwill ambassador from Israel," she said. "I bring to Vancouver a small piece of Israel – me."

JFGV interviewed "many candidates" over the "eight or nine month" search for a new shaliach, executive director Drew Staffenberg said. "Dina was far ahead of the other people we talked to. She will fit in well with our team and our system."

Before arriving in Vancouver on July 13, Wachtel worked for Keren Hayesod in Jerusalem for three years. "It was a great experience. I met VIPs and representatives of Jewish communities from all over the world, and also got to see how the money that was raised in campaigns all over the world was spent in Israel," she said.

Approximately 40 percent of the money raised by the Greater Vancouver campaign finds its way to the Jewish Agency for Israel, via the United Israel Appeal of Canada and Keren Hayesod. Canadian donations help fund things like aliyah and new immigrant absorption, rescuing Jews from persecution and war and strengthening Jewish identity in the Diaspora.

Wachtel, 34, has spent time in North America before, living in New York for three years as a teenager.

"My father, Itzhak Tsour, was an Israeli diplomat who worked in New York for the prime minister's office," she said. "I still have strong memories of the experience, because it was the first time I had lived outside Israel. I realized for the first time that to be Jewish was to be a member of a minority group. Although I went to a Jewish school in Manhattan, I was living in a mainly non-Jewish environment."

Although she enjoyed New York, Wachtel returned to Israel for her last year of high school, determined to graduate in her own country. After graduation, she entered the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and became a lieutenant in the air force.

After three years in the IDF, Wachtel went to Hebrew University and graduated with a double major in sociology and international relations. She then completed a one-year Ministry of Tourism cadet course and served as assistant to the Minister of Tourism.

A year-and-a-half later she became sales manager of the Sheraton Plaza Hotel in Jerusalem, which gave her plenty of opportunity to travel in Europe and Asia.

JNF shaliach heads home

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Itzchak Fuchs, Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach to British Columbia for the past three years, says Jews who live on Canada's West Coast need to get together and build a strong community.

"There's nothing wrong with living in a Jewish ghetto," Fuchs told The Canadian Jewish News as he prepared for his return this month to Israel. "Look at Israel. It's a Jewish ghetto surrounded by Arabs."

Fuchs says the Jewish community in British Columbia should get its act together before outside circumstances force it to become unified. "Why wait until anti-Semitism pushes us together again?"

A brigadier-general in the IDF reserve, Fuchs says he is looking forward to going back to his "bad neighborhood" in the Middle East. "It's time to go home; all my targets have been accomplished," he said. "Vancouver is a very nice place, very peaceful, but Israel is home. We've given the best years of our lives to building and protecting it."

Fuchs, whose home is in Yavne, near Ashdod, decided to come to Vancouver after hearing former British Columbia shaliach Kami Robinson sing the praises of the West Coast. Fuchs arrived in Vancouver with his wife Dafna and children Alon, Sharon and Hadar in 1995, the same year he joined the JNF after a 28-year career in the IDF. "I needed a break," said Fuchs. "And the job gave me and my family a chance to live abroad for three years."

Like other JNF emissaries across Canada, Fuchs' main responsibility was to raise money to finance the organization's land reclamation, afforestation and development projects in Israel. Fuchs says that when he started his job three years ago, he knew nothing about fundraising beyond the "people skills" he had picked up while serving in the IDF. "Although my English isn't perfect, I know how to approach people," Fuchs said. "I know that it helps to be direct without being pushy."

Fuchs' know-how paid off when he landed a $1 million-donation from Vancouver millionaire Jimmy Pattison. "Soon after I first came to Vancouver, I learned that Mr. Pattison had donated seriously to the JNF in the past," Fuchs said. "So I phoned him up and went to talk to him. He asked me how much I wanted, and I said 'nothing.' Over time we became friendly. We played golf together, he invited me and my wife to his boat for dinner and, later, to his house in Palm Springs for the weekend. Eventually I asked Jimmy for $1 million, and he said, 'sure.'"

The generous donation by Pattison, who, Fuchs said, is a committed Christian and a big supporter of Israel, helped finance the construction of a water reservoir near Kibbutz Eilon on the Lebanese border.

Although the JNF office is located close to the geographic centre of Vancouver, its territory takes in all of British Columbia. Fuchs often travelled to Victoria and to many of the smaller "up-island" communities on Vancouver Island, as well as to Kelowna and the southern Okanagan, where there is a small but thriving Jewish community, and a very supportive non-Jewish community, too. "Kelowna is having its Negev Dinner on Sept. 13 to honor Mel Cutler," Fuchs said. "The local Jewish community has 50 or 60 members, but the dinner, which has about 350 spaces, is almost all sold out."

Although officially leaving his emissary position, Fuchs will return with the new shaliach and stay for a few more weeks to show him the ropes. Presumably Fuchs will pass on to his replacement his tips for successful fundraising: "The first secret of raising money is that people give to people," Fuchs explained. "The other is that you need to have a good cause if you're going to be successful, and the JNF is a very good cause."

Pier 21 brings back happy memories for survivor

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX – Michael Kraus was an 18-year-old with high hopes for a better life when he debarked the HMS Aquitania at Pier 21 in Halifax on Aug. 3, 1948.

Fifty years later, Kraus returned to Pier 21 and recalled the moment he arrived in a new land from his native Czechoslovakia.

The 68-year-old Brookline, Mass. resident remembers "standing on the deck of the boat, looking at the town and seeing huge American cars on the docks, cars we saw only on film. I remember a town made of wooden houses, very different from central Europe, where we associated wooden houses only with vacation colonies.

"And I remember being able to drink ginger ale and Coca-Cola, beverages we didn't know in Czechoslovakia."

Now a successful Boston-area architect, Kraus and his wife, Ilana, a pediatrician, recently flew to Halifax and enjoyed time in the city where he had his first taste of North American life.

The couple also spent two days in Lunenburg, where they met Ruth Goldbloom, whose volunteer fundraising and organizational efforts have helped re-furbish Pier 21.

"It is amazing that someone is trying to bring Pier 21 back to life," Kraus says of Goldbloom and her volunteer committee. "It's a celebration of my life and of the lives of hundreds of thousands who also came to Canada through Pier 21."

Kraus spent his early years in Nachod, Czechoslovakia, a city of 15,000, including 400 Jewish families, all of whom were deported in 1942 by the Nazis. Taken to the Teresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia, he was transferred to Auschwitz a year later and survived the war through what he calls "a series of chances."

His sick father was unable to work and was sent to the gas chamber, while his mother was selected to work in another camp and died six months later.

Being strong enough to work, Kraus moved from camp to camp.

In January 1945, he was sent with 90 other boys to another part of Auschwitz. Half died over the next few months, while the rest were shuttled between concentration camps until spring.

"We were marched to the last camp two weeks before the war ended. We went a week without food or water and had typhoid fever. We were at the end of our lives. I would have died if the war had lasted three days longer," Kraus says.

Liberated on May 5, 1945, he spent six weeks in an American-run hospital in such bad shape that he couldn't celebrate the liberation.

A man and woman from his home town who lost a child in the war took in Kraus– the only Jew from Nachod to survive the war – and helped him get back to school. But in 1948, "they had the foresight to ship me out because they saw no future with the Communist takeover."

He then went to Montreal where he earned a high school certificate and briefly attended McGill University. A cousin in New Jersey arranged his immigration to the United States, where he earned an architecture degree from Columbia University.

Kraus kept a diary during the war years and continues it today. A film producer heard of his records and asked him to participate in a documentary of the war, Voices of the Children, which has aired on PBS.

He and the remaining members of the group of 45 orphaned survivors held a 1990 reunion in Israel and still keep in contact.

The return to Pier 21 has special significance for Kraus.

"Because I came to Pier 21 in Halifax, I was given a new lease on life. That is worth celebrating," he says.

Sources close to the family told The CJN the baby was buried on July 28 in Hamilton's Adas Israel Cemetery and the family remained in Hamilton, where Sharon Busch's parents live, for the shivah.

According to police and Air Canada spokespeople, the baby was being breastfed during the plane's approach to Toronto when she apparently stopped breathing. Flight crew staff and a doctor travelling on board as a passenger were unable to clear an obstruction in the child's airway and she went into cardiac arrest. The doctor then started cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

The plane landed at Pearson International Airport at 6:41 a.m. and reached Terminal 2 at 6:49, where it was met by paramedics who rushed the baby to Etobicoke General Hospital, Davenport said.

Trying "valiantly" to revive the baby en route to the hospital, Davenport said, paramedics were able to get a pulse, probably as a result of efforts at cardiopulmonary resuscitation, but the baby was still not breathing on her own. The baby was transferred to the Hospital for Sick Children at about 10 a.m. and died there later in the day, Davenport said.

Hospital for Sick Children spokesperson Helen Simeon called the incident an "odd sort of situation" involving what appeared to be a "perfectly healthy baby that got sick during the flight." For reasons of privacy, she would not elaborate further on the case without consent of the family.

According to the Regional Coroner's Office for Metropolitan Toronto, an autopsy was done on July 28, and the body was released to the parents the same day, which the coroner's office said usually indicates a death is non-controversial.

Officials with knowledge of the case would not release further details, in accordance with privacy laws and at the request of the baby's family.

When contacted by The CJN, neither Israeli Consulate officials in Toronto nor Israeli Embassy officials in Ottawa were aware of the case.

McMaster U student volunteers in Ecuador

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As far back as she can remember, Leora Glick has wanted to be a doctor. This summer the McMaster University student, who hopes to specialize in pediatrics, combined career interest and love for travel as a volunteer in Ecuador.

The 21-year-old Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto alumna, who is entering her third year of kinesiology, recently spent two weeks on a service program run by Global Volunteers. The Minnesota-based nonprofit organization, which Glick learned about on the Internet, sends volunteers to 18 countries.

As part of a small team of volunteers – including a doctor, a physiotherapist and a nurse – Glick took care of young children at a Quito day care/orphanage known as Camp Hope. She also painted murals and accompanied the doctor on gynecology rounds at makeshift medical clinics in and around the capital city.

Glick is no stranger to volunteering – she has had experience at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and Bloorview MacMillan Centre as well as in pediatric oncology at Hamilton's McMaster-Chedoke Hospital and the Magen David Adom program in Israel – but she was particularly struck by the gratitude of the Ecuadorian patients.

"They'd offer you everything from animals to [an invitation to] come to their home for dinner," she said. "They're just so grateful. They hug you and hold your hand and do blessings over your head."

But the highlight of her trip was working with the children at Camp Hope, about a third of whom have disabilities. "Every time we walked in every morning they'd be waiting there with their arms open and big smiles on their faces," she said. "It was so hard to leave them, you have no idea. You'd think they would get attached to us and it would be hard for them when we left, but it was just as hard for us."

Back in Toronto, where she is working for the rest of the summer at a day camp and swim school, Glick pondered some of the things Canadians take for granted. "People live with a whole lot less than we have here. We have so many opportunities that they don't have."

Seeing small children begging on the street was disconcerting. "There are so many beggar kids...How could you not give them money? These babies – dirty little kids – and the amount they're begging for would equal a nickel here."

Glick also spent some of her Ecuadorian sucres at outdoor markets, buying sweaters, rugs and hammocks like the one she used in a treehouse when she toured the country after the program ended.

Quito, however – which, incidentally, has a small Jewish community – is very polluted, she said.

Pollution, beggars and long hours notwithstanding, Glick's experience was overwhelmingly positive. "I definitely want to go on another program of this sort. I'd like to work in a developing country in the future,"she said.

The Antiquary: landscape & cityscape

Are you looking for an upscale condominium, close to urban amenities, yet shielded from big-city noise and congestion? Something with all the conveniences of condo living, yet in a pleasant natural setting? If your answer to these questions is yes, take a close look at the Antiquary of York Mills.

Four years ago, Patrick Tsung, president of the L & A Group of Companies, had an inspiration. Involved at the time with projects in London, England, he believed he saw new development possibilities opening up in Toronto. "I had a feeling," he says, "that the market here was going to come back."

Time has proven him right. Tsung has lived in Toronto since 1984; but he has international experience as a builder in Hong Kong, Singapore and London. In the Antiquary, he and his team unite this experience with a thorough knowledge of the Toronto market.

In 1995, L & A built a 120-unit luxury downtown condo complex at 102 Bloor Street West, which attracted buyers from around the world. The Antiquary of York Mills, at 11 William Carson Court, is quite different, and attests to L & A's versatility in satisfying different market segments.

The Toronto condominium market, says Tsung, is a challenge: buyers are sophisticated and demanding. At the same time, they offer a great opportunity to a team with experience, expertise and imagination; and the financial and psychological satisfaction of success in such an environment is huge.

The target market of the Antiquary is local buyers, currently living within an 8-10 kilometre radius. Some people, however, wanting to move into the city, have come from as far away as Mississauga, Richmond Hill, Thornhill and Gormley.

The Antiquary is selling to upper and middle management, and owners of companies, whose children have grown up and left home. The ideal buyer is active professionally and socially and enjoys the city lifestyle, but values privacy and natural beauty.

The Antiquary is a 6 storey low-rise complex; and the architecture, harmonizing with natural features of Hogg's Hollow, represents a happy marriage of landscape and cityscape. Following the path of William Carson Court as it winds into the Hollow, the building's L-shape hugs the hill it backs onto.

The design was created by Burka Architects, which designed 102 Bloor St. W. The style shows English and European influences. The major building material is a richly coloured golden-yellow brick; and the landscaping features plenty of trees, flower gardens, and a rock garden.

Being near Yonge St., the Antiquary offers easy access to downtown, as well as major highways. Despite this closeness to the amenities, however, it offers you a certain pleasant seclusion: it can not be seen from Yonge St.

Prices range from $198,900 for a ground-floor unit with 1 bedroom + den, to $619,900 for a penthouse. Parking is an extra $14,500. Most units are 1 and 2 bedroom, ranging from 865-1,630 sq. ft.; the penthouses range from 1,180-2,150 sq. ft. There are 5 penthouses left now, all with good views; each has 2 bedrooms + den, and a fireplace.

Ten-foot ceilings make for spaciousness; and every master bedroom has a balcony. Some ground-floor units have landscaped terraces with interlocking bricks. Also, a 5x5' frosted glass window lets light shine through the master into the ensuite bathroom, preserving privacy while brightening the room.

Unlike many residents of 102 Bloor St. W., residents of the Antiquary will be car owners; many of them will own more than one. For the 127 units, L & A is providing 200 parking spots; and every penthouse has 2. There are also 33 visitor spaces, all underground.

Separately metred for hydro, maintenance fees are 34¢ per sq. ft.; they include everything but cable and telephone. There is 24-hour security and concierge service as well. There are 4 elevators, 2 of which are in the centre of the building. For the physically active, there is an exercise room, indoor pool and sauna.

Construction is to begin in November this year, with occupancy scheduled for January 2000. Tsung, who believes the condo market is far from saturated, has no worries about running short of buyers. Over 50 units have been sold already; so don't delay.

Call the sales office at 416-223-2133 or go direct. Sales office hours Monday.-Thursday., 12 noon-7 p.m., Saturday., Sunday and Holidays, 11 a.m.-5 p.m., Friday by appointment only.

Good, Better, Best Drexel Heritage has them all

Often, household budgets dictate the level of quality you can afford in a major purchase for the home.

Young couples starting out, second marriages combining disparate tastes in household assets, established family units, summer homes and retirement living all call for special considerations when choosing furnishings that fit the budget, meet a high quality standard and have intrinsic long-term value.

The recently-opened Drexel Heritage Gallery in the De Boer Studio Collection at Sheppard and Allen Road, is atuned to various consumer needs and presents a 'good, better, best' scenario of home furnishings and accessories, from contemporary to traditional, designed to suit any pocketbook.

"We can also help people sort out their preferences and needs," says Sally Van Camp, Marketing Director for De Boer's Furnishings. "A few simple questions can take the confusion out of decision-making."

Ms. Van Camp's questions often focus on the mood and ambiance to be created in a room setting. Should it be formal, transitional, romantic, active, spacious or indestructible? Should the style be country, contemporary, southwestern or neo-classic?

The choice of woods, colours, fabrics and patterns also presents a befuddlement. The staff at Drexel Heritage is skilled at helping people come to terms with basic needs and wants in home furnishings.

Budget is often the overriding consideration. Whether starting from scratch or choosing a piece that complements existing furnishings, Ms. Van Camp has good advice. "One good quality item is better value than three of lesser quality for the same price," she says, "it is wise, in the long run, to invest in one good item and add to it when budget permits."

A popular start-up choice is the Solutions Collection. This contemporary, serviceable, yet elegantly styled line has surprisingly unique features such as a dining table with a built-in, heat resistant decor panel for hot plates.

For the traditionalist, there's the Corinthian Collection, drawing its inspiration from classic design themes and architectural forms. The result is a collection of rare beauty and matchless quality.

Drexel Heritage is open Monday to Wednesday and Saturday from 10 to 6, Thursday and Friday 10 to 9. Fred Hanes, ASID, ARIDO, Manager. Phone 416-630-5369.

Tennis anyone? Or golf?

Pinehurst inspires gentle, laid back way of life

The lifestyle experienced at the famous Pinehurst Country Club in North Carolina, site of the PGA 1999 Open, inspired the designers of Drexel Heritage's Pinehurst Collection, on view at The De Boer Studio Collection, Sheppard and the Allen, Toronto.

Pinehurst, founded in 1895, is among the most famous golfing resorts in the world. But Pinehurst is more than simply golf. It is a tranquil oasis from a fast-paced world; a place where life can be celebrated in a relaxing ambiance.

The furnishings in the Pinehurst Collection at Drexel Heritage capture the essence of old world charm and comfort. The materials vary... metal, wicker, leather, seeded glass, woven rope and mosaic stone, each crafted with the illusion of age and use.

Each piece in the Collection imparts the unique personality of a treasured heirloom... the soothing memory and priceless character of a cherished collectible.

Fifty to seventy-five percent of the time required to make a piece from the Pinehurst Collection is spent on hand-finishing.

The Pinehurst clubhouse 'look' is luxurious, sophisticated, traditional, classic and rich in colour. The cottage 'look' is light, airy, floral, romantic, nostalgic, simple and elegant. The mix-and-match possibilities are endless.

The signature of the Collection is the complicated 'distressing' process. Twenty-eight separate steps are required to gently create an antique patina on this prized heirloom furniture.

De Boer Honoured by City of Toronto

Brand name furniture captures major stronghold in Toronto

Famous North Carolina furniture manufacturer, Drexel Heritage, has opened a 17,000 square foot, dedicated retail showroom as part of The De Boer Studio Collection at Sheppard and the Allen in North York.

John de Boer, president of De Boer's, succeeded in enticing Drexel into an exclusive representation agreement because of De Boer's experience which spans 48 years in the Toronto marketplace.

Other brand name retailers in the same building are Bernhardt and Henredon, both well-known, reputable furniture manufacturers from North Carolina. "Based on the results we are enjoying, it makes good business sense to present three fine furniture makers in one location," says de Boer. "All share important consumer attributes -- quality, design and value."

Says Daniel Grow, president of Drexel Heritage, "Our alliance with De Boer's is a fine example of the Drexel tradition of partnering with successful retailers, nationally and internationally.

We look forward to serving a growing clientele in the Ontario market.

The de Boer family immigrated to Canada in 1949, and established their first home furnishings store in Toronto in 1950. Today, there are six locations serving Ontario consumers. President John de Boer acknowledges that the firm's success results from recognizing their customers' need for efficient, knowledgeable, superior service, and above all, maximum value.

Drexel Heritage got its start in 1903 in the foothills of the North Carolina mountains. Today, 3,500 people work at Drexel Heritage, many of them second and third generation furniture makers.

Drexel Heritage appeals to a broad consumer segment with traditional reproduction pieces, sophisticated country styles and trendy contemporary designs.

Like John de Boer, Drexel Heritage caters to consumers who have become increasingly aware of the value and quality behind a well-respected brand name.

Asthma increasing in frequency and severity

To Your Health spoke about asthma with respirologist Dr. Meyer Balter, director of the Asthma Education Clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto .

Asthma affects between five and 10 per cent of the population of industrialized nations such as Canada. It is one of the only common treatable conditions that is increasing in frequency and severity despite the development of more potent drugs.

To Your Health

Asthma is underdiagnosed and often undertreated, leading to avoidable hospitalization and even death.

Q. What is asthma?

A. Traditionally, asthma has been defined as a disease of the smooth muscle that lines the breathing tubes (bronchi) that intermittently went into spasm, leading to narrowing of the airways (bronchospasm). Patients experience symptoms such as shortness of breath, wheezing, chest tightness or cough or any combination thereof.

However, research investigations over the past 10 to 15 years have led to the discovery that asthma is a disease caused by swelling, or inflammation, of the bronchi. This inflammation causes the airways to be twitchy, or hyperresponsive, so that they narrow excessively when exposed to familiar asthmatic triggers such as cold air, smoke, allergens, leading to the well recognized symptoms of smooth muscle spasm.

Q. Will I become addicted or resistant to my asthma medications?

A. No! The term addiction implies a psychological and/or physical dependence on a drug. Psychological dependence does not occur with anti-asthma drugs. Physical dependence implies adaptation by the body to a drug as well as a gradual reduction in, or resistance to, the effect of the drug with time. There is little evidence for the loss of efficiency in opening up the airways by asthma drugs used at conventional dosages and the drugs appear to maintain their effectiveness over long periods.

However, for the most part, asthma medications do not cure the disease so that withdrawal of regular therapy when a patient feels better will most likely lead to recurrence of asthma symptoms within a few weeks or months.

Q. Will I outgrow my asthma?

A. This is a difficult question to answer. Somewhere between 20 and 50 percent of childhood asthmatics outgrow their disease by young adulthood, although the symptoms may return at a later date. It appears that the likelihood that your asthma will resolve decreases with age, very frequent symptoms, poor lung function (as measured by your doctor), and coexisting smoking-related damage to your lungs.

Q. Will my children get asthma if I have the disease?

A. There is no question that there is some genetic (hereditary) component to asthma. There is a greater chance you will develop asthma if your identical twin has the disease than if your non-identical twin has it, although both risks are higher than for a non-twin brother or sister. The presence of people with allergies in your family also appears to increase the risk for development of asthma in your children.

The specific genetic factors that underlie an inherited predisposition to asthma have yet to be clearly defined and are the focus of research being carried out at the University of Toronto and Mount Sinai Hospital. Hopefully, discovery of the genetic factors that are at least partially responsible for the development of asthma will allow us to determine the likelihood of an individual's developing asthma in the future, and also lead to more effective therapies.

Q. Why are there so many different types of asthma medications and which ones are best for me?

A. Asthma medications fall into two major groups: drugs that relax smooth muscles (bronchodilators) and drugs that decrease swelling in the airways (anti-inflammatories).

Use of bronchodilators leads to relaxation of the smooth muscle, widening of the airways and subsequent symptomatic relief of asthma within five to 10 minutes. Although symptoms are temporarily relieved by bronchodilators, the latter do nothing to combat the actual airway inflammation causing the disease.

Therefore, therapy of asthma in the 1990s is targeted at reversing this airway swelling with specific anti-inflammatory medications. These medications are quite safe and very effective but must be used on a regular basis to decrease airway inflammation and reduce the associated airway hyperresponsiveness, thereby raising the threshold for developing an asthma attack. It is important to point out that these anti-inflammatory drugs have no smooth muscle relaxing (bronchodilator) properties and thus they will not cause rapid relief of symptoms of an asthma attack.

Patients are usually prescribed medications from both the bronchodilator and anti-inflammatory groups of drugs. There are a variety of drugs to choose from in both groups, each with its own pros and cons in an individual patient, and should be discussed with your physician.

Q. How can asthma be better controlled?

A. Firstly, education is needed to help members of the public recognize asthma symptoms and encourage sufferers to seek appropriate medical care. Secondly, education is required about the rationale for modern therapy of asthma, proper use of medications and appropriate inhaler technique. Thirdly, patient and family education is needed to teach effective management of asthma to enable patients to lead active and relatively normal lives.

Q. What is an asthma education clinic?

A. An asthma education clinic provides the environment and personnel needed to achieve the goals of more effective asthma control listed above. Trained nurse-clinicians, respiratory therapists and/or physicians help teach patients about the causes, triggering factors and therapy of asthma.

Patients' inhaler techniques are reviewed and appropriate means of delivering necessary therapy are decided upon. Patients are taught about the warning signs of worsening asthma and instructed about how to alter their prescribed therapy on their own to effectively treat flares of their disease.

Preliminary studies of patient education programs suggest that they are an effective way of reducing emergency room visits and hospitalizations attributed to asthma.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I just found out that I am pregnant and I am trying to consume more dairy products, but I am not sure how much I actually need.

A. We now know that we don't have to consume additional calcium in pregnancy. We do, however, need to consume the recommended amount for our age. For example women 25 to 49 should consume approximately three servings per day of dairy products. A serving could be one cup of milk or a cup of yogurt. There are also a lot of non-dairy sources of calcium including many new soy milk products that are fortified with calcium.

Q. Is it true that skim milk actually contains more calcium than whole milk?

A. It is true, but the difference is very minimal. Eight ounces of skim milk contain 302 milligrams of calcium, 8 oz. of whole milk contain 288 mg.

Q. I really love nuts, but I know that they are fattening. Can you fill me in on some of my favorites, cashews, almonds and hazelnuts?

A. It is true that nuts are quite high in fat and calories. However, they do provide protein, and much of their fat is of the unsaturated type. One oz. of cashews contains 163 calories and 13 gm of fat. One oz. of almonds contains 167 calories and 15 gm of fat. One oz. of hazelnuts contains 188 calories and 19 gm of fat.

Israeli team joins rescue effort in Kenya bombing down the terrorists. He said early indications were that the bombings were the result of "international terrorism centered on Islamic fundamentalism."

Israeli and U.S. officials said that exiled Saudi billionaire Osama bin Laden, who lives in Afghanistan, was one of the main suspects.

Netanyahu said there is no need to convene an international meeting on terror, but cooperation at the diplomatic level and between the security services of various countries should be increased.

"I think you can say, though, that Israel is committed to fighting international terrorism – and particularly international terrorism of the Islamic fundamentalist type – in two ways," Netanyahu said. "One, by offering, as we did, humanitarian assistance and rescue teams that were promptly on site and have already saved lives; and two, by international cooperation, political and intelligence cooperation, to find the perpetrators and act against those who give them the support to act.

Moi visited the embassy site Sunday morning and said there were some leads in the investigation, but did not elaborate.

The Sunday Nation newspaper quoted an unidentified "security man" as saying he saw three Arab-looking men filming the U.S. Embassy for about 20 minutes, four days before the bombing. He alerted guards at the embassy, but they brushed him off, the paper said.

Closed-circuit TV cameras were monitoring the parking area behind the embassy where the bomb went off, but Ambassador Prudence Bushnell said she did not know whether the cameras or film survived the blast.

The FBI, which was sending 60 investigators to Nairobi and a separate team to the other bombing site at Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, has said its top priority is to determine the kind of explosive device used and the type of vehicle that carried it to the scene.

FBI spokesperson Frank Scafidi said this information "can be like a fingerprint of who did it."

Despite hopeful signs that some of the missing may still be alive, the death toll mounted.

Outside the Nairobi embassy, 155 people died, according to the Kenyan government. Inside the embassy, an additional 11 Americans and 24 Kenyans died, an embassy spokesperson said.

Immediately after news of the attack reached Israel, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz ordered the Home Front Command to dispatch the rescue teams and doctors to Nairobi. The delegation is led by Brig.-Gen. Ilan Harrari, chief staff officer of the Home Front Command.

The units rushed through the night to pack a C-130 cargo plane and an IAF airliner with rescue units, doctors and the IDF canine unit before setting off.

Magen David Adom sent 100 units of blood and announced that it is taking donations from those with O blood type at all of its stations.

The final go-ahead for sending the Israeli rescue teams came late Friday night when U.S. Ambassador Edward Walker officially requested the aid.

Netanyahu phoned Moi Saturday night and told him Israel is ready to provide any help needed.

It has been the policy of the Home Front Command's rescue unit for years to offer its services in worldwide disasters. This is one reason it has acquired so much expertise and such an excellent reputation in the field.

In addition, Defence Ministry officials said Israel has never forgotten that Kenya allowed the IAF to refuel its planes after the dramatic 1976 rescue at Entebbe, Uganda.

Warsaw enters row over crosses at Auschwitz

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Polish government, in an apparent reversal of its initial position, has said it now wants to help deal with a mounting confrontation over crosses erected by Catholics outside Auschwitz.

"The Polish government declares a will to contribute to solving the problem of the presence of religious symbols in Auschwitz-Birkenau, in cooperation with the Church authorities and all interested parties, in the spirit of tolerance and respecting [the] religious sensitivity of the Christians and the Jews," the government said in a statement.

The more than 50 crosses to commemorate 152 Polish Catholics executed at Auschwitz have drawn protests from the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, Yad Vashem, and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

The statement blamed "a few irresponsible people, who use the policy of accomplished facts, cause an escalation of the conflict and the mobilization of radical elements on both sides." Poles have been spurred to support the crosses by broadcasts from a renegade Catholic radio station, Radio Maryja.

The dispute also delayed the signing, which had been scheduled for last month, of a year-old Jewish-Polish agreement on the preservation and protection of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Earlier this week, the government said it could not remove the crosses because they were erected on private land and because it was up to the Catholic Church to decide what to do about religious symbols.

Last year, the Polish government and an international coalition of Jewish institutions, including Yad Vashem and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, reached an agreement regarding the future of the site.

The pact called for the removal of all religious symbols. At that time, the problematic symbols were those on Birkenau's Field of Ashes. Near the remains of the crematoria, the field is widely known as the largest Jewish cemetery in Europe, because one million Jews were killed there.

Those symbols were removed last December. However, a cross commemorating a papal mass remained, and other crosses have since been planted.

Warsaw's statement also said that the dispute "contributes to creating false opinions and stereotypes about the Polish society. It also harms a well-developing Polish-Jewish dialogue which has changed the quality of relations between the two nations."

PLC members resign

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC) members nearly came to blows during a debate over the new cabinet of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, with many legislators warning they will vote Sunday against what they termed a government that preserves corruption and mismanagement.

The vote had been scheduled for Saturday, but the motion was delayed by the request of 30 of the 88 PLC members to address the legislature regarding the new cabinet.

Outgoing minister Hanan Ashrawi, who, together with Abdul Jawad Salah, announced they would not serve in the new cabinet, called on the PLC to vote against the government.

"This cabinet represents the absence of respect for political institutions," PLC member Mohammed Horani of Arafat's own Fatah movement told the council.

The PLC session was tense as supporters of the new cabinet argued with its critics. The latter attacked Arafat's decision to retain three ministers accused in a PLC audit of waste and mismanagement while demoting two ministers and dismissing one, considered to have been most effective.

Arafat did not attend the session.

Hezbollah undergoing violent split

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah is undergoing a violent split with the quiet support of Syria and Iran, both of which want to decrease the growing independence of the Shi'ite movement in Lebanon, a defence report says.

The report, prepared by Israeli defence analysts, predicts that the feud will turn increasingly violent as the splinter group amasses power and influence.

The rivalry pits Hezbollah secretary-general Hassan Nasrallah against Subhi Toufeili, the former Amal operative who became Hezbollah's first secretary-general in 1986.

Toufeili, believed to have been involved in the kidnapping and killing of U.S. soldiers in 1983, is regarded as more extreme than the current Hezbollah leadership and for the last year has been advocating a confrontational policy toward the Lebanese government.

In July 1997, Toufeili launched his Revolution of the Hungry movement and declared a civil revolt of the Shi'ites in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley, who are regarded as the poorest people in the country and who deal extensively in the planting and production of heroin.

In contrast, Hezbollah's movement is led by residents of south Lebanon.

Toufeili, whose first rally was attended by 10,000 people, is demanding that the Beirut government allocate more resources to the Bekaa and opposes any attempt to curtail the drug trade in the valley.

The report says Toufeili is sending his supporters to Syria for military training.

So far, about 200 Hezbollah militants have quit the movement and joined Toufeili. Hezbollah, in response, decided to stop payments to those who joined the splinter group.

The rise of Toufeili has led to a decline in Nasrallah's status in the Bekaa and Baalbek regions. The change has been accompanied by violence, as Toufeili supporters have attacked Hezbollah representatives in the Bekaa and destroyed their property.

Toufeili has been supported by Hezbollah's spiritual leader Sheikh Hussein Fadlallah, who claims to be the Shi'ite spiritual authority, rather than Iran's Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

Another supporter is Amal leader and Lebanese Parliament speaker Nabih Berri, who prefers to see a divided Hezbollah to ensure his position in the Lebanese government.

The feud has turned so bitter that Nasrallah has appealed to Iran for a religious edict that would allow him to assassinate Toufeili, the report says.

British Jews in uproar

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A follower of Louis Farrakhan is creating an uproar in Britain.

Jewish leaders are calling for Paul Twino to be prosecuted on charges of inciting racial hatred after Twino accused the British government of capitulating to its "Hebraic puppeteers" when it barred the Nation of Islam leader from entering Britain last month.

Twino also said in a letter to British Home Secretary Jack Straw that the Board of Deputies of British Jews, the representative body of British Jewry, is a "loathsome and slanderous generation of talmudic vipers.

"With insolence unparalleled," Twino wrote, "the Jews have been shameless in their mutilation of his utterances.

"The absurdity of the false allegations leveled against the Honorable Minister Louis Farrakhan has been outweighed only by their sheer vindictiveness."

Twino also warned the British government of dire consequences if the order banning Farrakhan was not reversed.

Twino sent a copy of the letter to the Board of Deputies.

The board's director-general, Neville Nagler, said Twino's language was "consistently offensive and insulting.

"It is highly abusive toward the Jewish people and has many passages which reflect the writer's hatred toward members of our community. It might incite followers of the Nation of Islam to hatred against Jews."

Responding to the charges against him, Twino said he would be "more than happy to defend in a public forum or at court what I wrote," adding that Farrakhan's exclusion from Britain was unjustified.

A spokesperson for the prosecutor's office said it was still considering whether to take action against Twino.

Holocaust survivor in Czech cabinet

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — One of the Czech Republic's new deputy prime ministers has travelled a perilous path to power.

When Egon Lansky, then Egon Lowy, was 5 years old, his father, a doctor, fled to England after Hitler's troops invaded Czechoslovakia in 1939.

Meanwhile, when the Jews of his hometown of Trencin were rounded up for deportation in 1944, Lansky's mother, also a doctor, feigned medical problems. She and her children were transferred to a local hospital, where sympathetic former colleagues kept them as long as they could.

The family was eventually deported to Auschwitz, but survived.

Now, as deputy prime minister for European integration, Lansky will have as his primary responsibility, preparing the country for possible membership in the European Union.

But he will also have to steer his party and his country to a smoother relationship with Germany.

Lansky is the only Jewish member of the incoming cabinet, which was sworn in on July 22. But there is strong Jewish representation in the Czech foreign ministry. Deputy Foreign Minister Otto Pick is Jewish, for example.

Lansky's involvement with the Czech Jewish community includes membership in an organization called Beit Praha, the Open Jewish Community, which was set up by American Jewish expatriates, with the help of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, to provide an alternative to the official Orthodox community here.

Back in Trencin after the war, the Lowys changed the family name to Lansky, a less Jewish-sounding name to Czech ears, to escape anti-Semitism.

Lansky, now 64, was later thrown out of three universities for anti-Communist activities. He moved to Sweden after the 1968 Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia which ended that year's Prague Spring reform movement.

In Sweden, where he took citizenship, he earned degrees in journalism and politics. He became known as a conservative political columnist and also worked for the BBC in London and as a political commentator for Radio Free Europe.

Lansky returned to Czechoslovakia after the Velvet Revolution brought down communism in 1989. He became a spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and then was appointed ambassador in the Czechoslovak permanent mission to the Council of Europe.

Czech President Vaclav Havel asked Zeman to form a new government after the Social Democrats took a third of the popular vote in parliamentary elections in June.

Lansky joined the party after he ran for the Czech Senate as an independent in 1996 and won convincingly.

"You cannot be a conservative in the Czech Republic if you want to be a decent person," he said. "The right wing here does not have what the Tories in Britain, for example, have – compassion."

The Week in Israel

Aug. 3

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu created a new council to fight growing unemployment. The move came after the latest statistics indicated that unemployment had reached 9.3 percent in May, with some 210,000 people out of work.

Aug. 4

• The government, through the embassy in Bonn, denied German press reports that Israel refused to recognize the Orthodox conversion of the daughter of German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel and will not grant her citizenship. Embassy officials said there had merely been bureaucratic delays in processing the citizenship application of Andrea Kinkel, who is married to an Israeli and had converted in the United States.

Aug. 5

• Netanyahu told Israel Radio that the slayings of two youths at Yizhar proved the need for a Palestinian crackdown on militants before Israel agrees to further redeployment from the West Bank. Later in the week, senior Israeli security officials warned against expanding the settlement at Yizhar.

• Some 1,000 immigrants arrived in Israel from 12 different countries as part of Aliyah Day ceremonies.

Aug. 6

• A leading Orthodox rabbi in Israel called for the institution of civil marriages in Israel that will carry no religious weight. Yisrael Rosen, head of the Chief Rabbinate's Conversion Authority said he believes his proposal is necessary because of the high number of recent immigrants to Israel who are not Jewish.

• Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel announced an unexpected 1.5 percent cut in the key lending rate, taking it down to 9.5 percent, its lowest level in almost six years. He also announced an inflation target of four percent for 1999.

Aug. 7

• The shekel fell against all major foreign currencies, losing 1.78 percent of its value against the U.S. dollar.

Visitors gather to remember internment of Jews in Cyprus

By WENDY EISEN
Special to The CJN

DHEKELIA, Cyprus – The British internment of 52,384 Jewish refugees in Cyprus from 1946 to 1949 is a lesser-known aspect of modern Jewish history, yet it was a fundamental component in the establishment of an independent Jewish state in Palestine.

Fifty years later, on this island in the eastern Mediterranean, six Canadians were among the 150 Jewish visitors from 25 countries who gathered to remember the Jewish captives who were forcibly denied the right to attempt to fulfill their Zionist dream.

"We are here in Cyprus on Israel's 50th anniversary, to commemorate a short chapter in the history of the Jewish people," said Baruch Gur, director general of Keren Hayesod. "We are here, as well, to pay tribute to gallant Cypriots who assisted the refugees during their period of detention."

The first-ever commemoration of the internment of the Zionist pioneers, which commenced in Cyprus on June 9, launched the 1998 Keren Hayesod United Israel Appeal annual world conference. From Cyprus, the delegates travelled by ship to Israel, but quite differently from the way their brethren did 50 years before.

Jewish refugees, fleeing eastern Europe for a new life in Palestine, were bitterly disappointed. In overcrowded, battered, wooden boats, they set sail from European ports only to find a tight naval blockade of Palestine's coast.

Initially, according to the policy set down in the White Paper, the British interned the "illegal" immigrants at Atlit near Haifa, and released them in a trickle of 750 per month. As the numbers in Atlit became unwieldy, the detainees were transferred to newly created camps on the British-dominating colony of Cyprus.

From Aug. 13, 1946 to April 26, 1948, 39 rickety boats, filled with thousands of refugees, entered the harbor of Haifa. Most were greeted by British naval officers who boarded the boats wearing steel helmets and wielding billy-clubs, and with the use of water cannons and tear gas forced the ma'apilim – the would be immigrants – onto ships that took them to the island 16 hours away.

There, they were dumped into 12 detention camps in two blocs: the summer camps in Karalolos and the winter camps in Dhekelia. The camps were surrounded by barbed wire and water-towers, reminiscent of the hell they had just survived.

Dhekelia, still under British sovereign territory today, is where the Keren Hayesod group met with several former refugees and former members of the Israeli underground who had travelled from Israel to Cyprus to share stories.

"We did offer resistance," said Ya'acov Gilead, a retired Israeli naval officer, whose son was one of 2,200 babies born on Cyprus. "Our wooden trawler that had set sail a week earlier from Romania carried 1,400 refugees. As we entered the harbor, we found ourselves surrounded by three British warships.

We beached in Haifa, and for two days and nights armed only with potatoes that we threw at the soldiers, managed to resist – until our water ran out."

The dozen refugee holding camps in Cyprus consisted of grimy tents and small huts, filled with thousands of men, women and children. Though food was rationed and water was in short supply, the illegals enjoyed full autonomy in governing their daily lives.

Their existence on Cyprus was ameliorated by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and underground emissaries sent from Palestine. The emissaries formed a living bridge between the camp inmates and their future homeland. They helped to develop an internal structure with a school system, Hebrew language classes and a clandestine newspaper. In carefully planned operations, the emissaries smuggled refugees out through secret tunnels.

Lack of sufficient water resulted in inadequate toilet and laundry facilities, which led to abysmal hygiene. As disease permeated the camps, doctors and nurses arrived from Palestine to minister to the sick.

In the fall of 1946, Nehama Guttman was sent as chief nurse to set up medical clinics in the winter camps in Dekelia. "I can still smell the stench and feel the suffering of the mothers for their babies. Years later, I would be awakened from my sleep by the nightmare of Cyprus."

Tears clouded the eyes of Prodromos Papavassiliou, the 79-year-old Cypriot hero, when tribute was paid to him for his steadfast assistance to the Jews. Everyone in the camps revered Papavassiliou for his efforts in facilitating the distribution of food, clothing and medical supplies to the internees.

"We were very sorry when the camps were built," the small, stout man told the assembly. "Sympathy came from the joint struggle by the Zionists and the Cypriots against British rule. Here were the British liberators from the war against the Nazis, building camps for the Nazis' victims. We protested when they were built, we protested when they opened, we protested when the first Jews arrived and we celebrated when they closed."

When the State of Israel was declared on May 15, 1948, 27,000 persons had made aliyah from Cyprus by both legal and illegal means. But approximately 25,000 remained. The British continued to enforce a UN embargo on "arms and fighting men" entering the country, so the camps remained open.

The 52,384 Jews who were interned in British detention camps in Cyprus represented almost one-tenth of Israel's population at that time. Their detention was a cruel twist on the road to Jewish freedom and Israeli statehood.

"Ike," a commander of the Exodus (left); the illegal immigrant ship Haim Arlosoroff ran aground on Israeli shores, with a British destoyer in the background.

Book helps author cope with brother's death

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Nomi Berger's non-fiction work tries to solve a puzzling mystery

TORONTO — The last time Nomi Berger saw her brother Peter, he was 19 years old and submerged in Montreal's pot-smoking and acid-dropping hippie counter-culture.

The year was 1968. Peter, who lived in a house with several others, had recently been arrested for drug possession and had fought bitterly with his parents. "Help me," he had beseeched his sister, hugging her, making her break into tears.

"My husband dragged me out of the room and I never saw my brother again," says Berger, who was then 23 years old. "When the brother you love says 'Help me' and three weeks later he's dead, what do you do? The feeling that I had failed him was so strong and the guilt so powerful that I just went into a tailspin. The shock of it, the guilt of it – I didn't know how to cope."

Berger, now a Toronto-based novelist with seven novels to her credit, says that the act of re-searching and writing her first work of non-fiction – My Brother Peter: Murder or Suicide? – has helped her to gain mastery over her grief and over the nagging doubts about how her brother died.

"This book," she said during a recent interview, "is an illustration that there's no statute of limitations on either grief or guilt, but especially on one's ability to look for answers and find piece of mind."

Peter, who had been scheduled to appear as a witness in another drug-related court case, died mysteriously with a knife in the heart. "The police ruled it a suicide but I always thought it was a murder to silence him," says Berger, who three years ago launched her own intensive investigation. She contacted many of Peter's friends, found doctors who had treated him during his brief stay in a psychiatric hospital, even tracked down the RCMP officer who had arrested him.

She also followed a paper trail of official documents, many of which she had to pry from recalcitrant and uncooperative bureaucracies. "I was told 'no' but I pushed and harangued and eventually used the Access to Information Act to get everything I wanted. I set legal precedents at every step of the way because every bureaucracy said to me, 'We don't know what to do with you, you're a test case.' That's another reason I wrote this book – to help people through the system.

"The more I got into it, the more obsessed I became. It took me over a year, full time, seven days a week, every moment of every day – phoning people, hiring lawyers, going to commissions, and just never letting go.

"Because it seemed to me that every answer I got opened up 20 more questions. Many times, when I was going through this, I questioned not only my own sanity but my ability to survive it, it was so horrendous."

In My Brother Peter, which reads like a detective story, Berger does not reach a definitive opinion about his death. "The conclusion is that there was not enough evidence of murder" – but she invokes a sort of closure on the tragic event of three decades ago. In some way, she says, she had become stuck in her mourning, unlike her father, Michael Berger, a prominent immigration lawyer who died nine years ago, or her mother, who now lives in Toronto.

"It was she who told me many years ago, 'I don't think you've ever come to terms with Peter's death.' I always thought I had. We were very close and I missed him terribly. He appeared in every one of my novels, short stories and poems. Only much later did I recognize that it was true, I had never gotten over his death."

This book marks a departure for Berger, whose previous works fall into the category of mainstream contemporary or women's fiction. A 1983 book Devotions became a Canadian bestseller and several others have been translated and distributed internationally. Her most recent book before My Brother Peter was Dreams to Keep, a novel of the Holocaust.

My Brother Peter is certain to be of interest to general readers, but Berger says she is also "reaching to my constituency – the bereavement community. There are bereavement and suicide groups in every major city. Suicide touches almost everybody, and to dam up the grief cripples you. It doesn't have to be that dark secret that you hide away like an insane aunt who's locked in the attic."

Published by Robert Davies Publishing of Montreal (800-481-2440), My Brother Peter is 256 pages long and is available in bookstores or from the publisher for $21.99.

Writing music part of singer's grieving process

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Sometimes it takes a tragedy to give an artist that extra burst of creativity. In Marnie Levitt's case, it was the death of her sister Stacey, who died in a car crash at the age of 18 a few years ago.

"After sitting shivah for seven days, you ask yourself what you are left with," singer/songwriter Levitt, 23, said recently. "You become so raw. All of your senses are heightened and you become very aware of everything around you."

Levitt said this heightened awareness has helped her creatively. "I am able to take things in far more sensitively, which makes for better songwriting. A good songwriter has to be in touch with her emotions in order to write from the heart.

Although she has been playing guitar since Grade 10, she said she was not comfortable playing her songs for others.

"It wasn't until my sister died that my music became meaningful and made me want to share it with others. The pain that I feel deep inside my body is transferred out of me through my voice. Somewhere in that transfer the pain turns into healing.

"Music is so healing. A lot of my songs are about grief and loss, but some are about hope for a better future – they're not all depressing."

She says this "transfer" gives her music a spiritual edge. "My music gets me in touch with a lot of things I cannot see, such as my emotions and my sister Stacey's spirit. I hope this is communicated in my songs."

Levitt's brand of folk rock has a contemporary flavor to it – "folk rock with a twist," she calls it. Based on the two songs I've heard, it sounds like a jazzed up Sarah McLachlan meets Holly Cole.

"I like to push the boundaries of folk rock by adding a bit of jazz, r&b and alternative," Levitt said.

Born and raised in Toronto, Levitt is attending the Women's Studies program at McGill University in Montreal, where she has gained a popular following. Her musical inspiration comes mostly from female artists like McLachlan, Noa, Ani DiFranco, Me'Shell, Joni Mitchell and others.

"I feel more connected to women writers than men," she said. "I relate more to the way they sing, write and perform."

Levitt credits her parents with giving her a lot of support. "They definitely encouraged me musically. I think that expressing yourself and not being inhibited are very Jewish traits.

"In Montreal I get a lot of encouragement from the Jewish community; a lot of the people who come to my shows are Jewish students at McGill. On the other hand," she said, "being Jewish has its disadvantages. People expect you to pursue legitimate professions like law, medicine, etc. Sometimes it's difficult for people to understand you want to do something else."

Her diverse vocal range and strong songwriting skills have attracted the attention of top promoters and producers. She is hoping to record a CD with a variety of musicians in the next year. She's also looking forward to going on a major tour.

Levitt plays many shows in Montreal and has played in New York. You can catch her in Toronto Aug. 18, 9 p.m., at the Free Times Cafe (320 College St.) as part of the Acoustic Spotlight Women's Night.

SIMCHOVITCH BOOK OF POEMS REPRINTED

Lugus Publications of Toronto recently issued a second edition of Toronto poet Simcha

Simcha Simchovitch

Simchovitch's collection, A Song Will Remain, featuring more than 150 short poems selected from a lifetime of poetry writing. Most of the poems in the volume were translated from their original Yiddish and Polish into English.

Simchovitch, who was born in Otwock, Poland in 1921, displays a wide range in these poems. They focus on a spectrum of subjects, such as the medieval Spanish-Jewish philosopher Ibn Pakuda, the pained Polish landscape the poet left behind, vistas of Siberia where he fled during wartime, and scenes from the Holocaust.

Numerous poems also focus on post-war Canada, which the poet graciously celebrates, as in this short ode to Toronto, called Homecoming: "The lights of Toronto/ greet me from afar/ at homecoming. They tell me,/ 'You have a place on earth/ and arms to embrace you.'"

This is the volume that Bernard Baskin, writing in The CJN, called "a lasting contribution to Canadian Jewish poetry," and which Arnold Ages, writing in the Globe and Mail, said would "permit English readers an opportunity to feel and understand the Yiddish cadences that have animated [Simchovitch's] vision of at least three different worlds – pre-Holocaust Poland, wartime Siberia and modern Canada."

A Song Will Remain, with an introduction by Adam Fuerstenberg, is available at bookstores or directly from Lugus Publications, 322-5113. E-mail [lugust@tvo.org].

Harpist boldly goes where none has gone before

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — Harpist Joanna Jordan's self-designed Web site says she's "on a harptrek, boldly going where no harpist has gone before."

That she's a harpist designing her own Web site is proof enough.

But it's her innovative approach that really sets her apart. After all, how many harpists mix – or would try to mix – Prokofiev, The Doors and a Harpo Marx impersonation in the same concert?

Combining jazz, rock, blues, world and classical music on one program – with some theatrical flare and standup comedy thrown in – furthers Jordan's goal of making the harp, and classical instruments generally, relevant to modern audiences.

Many people consider the harp elitist and are frequently put off by the often "snobby and arrogant" classical world, she says.

"They're just out of style, and that's why a lot of classical music is dying now," the Toronto-based Jordan says.

But to those for whom pop and jazz harp are heresy, the 20-year veteran player notes that Mozart was as iconoclastic and popular in his day as rock groups like AC/DC are now.

With four albums mixing classical and modern genres to her credit, including two with CLAZZ, her ensemble of bass, harps and drums, the 40-something Jordan pushes a similar envelope.

Traditionalists were shocked, she says, when she recently won, by unanimous decision of the judges, the 3,000-member American Harp Society's (AHS) 1998 Concert Artist Award.

Award-winning harpist Joanna Jordan.

Awarded biannually, it's the most prestigious prize in the harp world and comes with a modest $7,000 stipend, intended to help the winner perform concerts promoting the harp at AHS chapters around the world (the misnamed AHS is an international organization), as well as finance some educational and promotional costs, such as demo tapes and brochures.

To win, Jordan played excerpts from her concert repertoires for both adults and children, which include dramatic use of lighting and comedic impersonations of what celebrities like Tina Turner and Michael Jackson would act and sound like as harpists.

For the august AHS, it was all "very taboo" says Jordan. "There are probably some people who do not like what I'm doing."

Unlike some harpists, "I don't have an arrogant, snotty approach when I put on a concert," she says.

Although she's twice won prizes at the International Jazz and Pop Harp Festival, just being one of seven harpists chosen to audition for the June AHS competition "felt like I had won a bit of battle," she says.

"I tell you, they [the AHS audience-members] were sitting there trying not to like [my performance]," says Jordan.

Nevertheless, the 300-member audience of her peers "went mad" for her act. "They know how hard it is to go from Hendrix to Handel in a minute."

Evolving from a hunter's bow and arrow to the innovative electric harp used by Jordan – which she paid for by selling her downtown apartment and prefers for its lack of noisy mechanical pedals – the harp has faced extinction in the past, Jordan says.

Despite its popularity with both audiences and composers up to the Baroque period, "the harp almost became extinct," Jordan says, due to J.S. Bach's innovative chromatic music.

Bach's music catalyzed innovations like the key-based harpsichord and the piano – which Jordan jokingly calls "a cheap renovation of a harp."

The classical harp, restricted to diatonic music based on a seven-note scale, needed pedals to play chromatically, she says.

Even so, the harp was neglected for a period of 150 to 200 years, as composers like Beethoven and Mozart (who "hated the harp," says Jordan) wrote little for the instrument.

Harp is in danger today because, with 46 strings versus a piano's 88 keys, it's difficult, even with pedals, to play popular genres like jazz and rock, says Jordan.

Despite her talent, she says many thought her late start on the harp would preclude a professional career.

Originally a math and psychology major at George Washington University in Washington D.C., with plans to be an actuary or a dream therapist, she took harp as an elective, rekindling a childhood dream. By second year, she had become a music major.

When her father, a retired U.S. Air Force colonel, moved to Toronto in 1973 to open the Canadian arm of a lighting firm, she came to study with renowned Toronto Symphony harpist Judy Loman at U of T.

In the early 1980s, she landed a cocktail-hour gig at the Royal York's Gazebo Room, where she was exposed to the likes of Ella Fitzgerald and Tony Bennett, who both asked her to jam with them in their Imperial Room sets. She even once double-dated with Bennett and his bassist.

"A lot of people who first saw me at the Royal York dining room when I first got started can't believe I'm playing at an international level," Jordan says.

But it was the reception from audiences at five 1989 concerts in Northern Ontario which really sold her on performing for a living.

"It's sort of like if you have a little taste of smoked salmon, you say, no more tuna fish for me," she says.

After one performance, "the whole audience formed a receiving line – 300 people and everyone wanted to hug me."

Honing her performance skills, she spent 1990 to 1997 studying jazz performance and composition at Humber College and comedy at Second City, tapping RRSPs and borrowing money from her parents.

"Trying to create my art at a higher level has really maxed me out financially," she says.

But Jordan's gift for performance has brought her unforeseen rewards.

As a volunteer playing for palliative care patients at Mississauga's Credit Valley Hospital, she was recently asked to play guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan's Pride and Joy at the funeral of a patient for whom she learned the piece.

The man's family said it would help their grieving process.

"I have received many honors in my life, but this was the greatest honor of all," she says.

TORONTO — Only in the world of professional tennis are you considered a senior citizen at age 34.

But American Jim Grabb, the oldest tennis player to compete at the $2.5-million du Maurier Canadian Open held recently at the National Tennis Centre at York University, feels he has just begun to play his best tennis.

"I thought in January that 1998 would be my last year on the pro circuit. But I have played a lot better than I expected. Even now at 34, I am learning how to improve my strokes. For example, my return of service is more consistent now than it has been for the past five years," said Grabb,who was the only Jewish player competing at the Canadian Open.

Grabb has rebounded from a poor season when he was ranked 32nd in doubles. (He stopped playing singles in 1996.) He has a strong 26-15 record in 1998, finishing as a finalist once and as a semi-finalist in three other tournaments, to maintain his current ranking at 13th.

Teaming with Martin Damm of Czech Republic, Grabb finished as a quarter-finalist at the Canadian Open, having his most impressive result with a 6-7 (12-14), 6-3, 6-0 victory over Americans Doug Flach and Michael Tebbutt.

In that match, Grabb's long reach (he is 6 foot 4) and powerful serve baffled Flach and Tebbutt in the final set. Trailing in three of his service games at 0-40, Grabb maintained focus, saving countless break points and leading his team to victory.

Since turning pro in 1986 after graduating from Stanford University, Grabb has won the prestigious French and U.S. Open doubles titles (in 1989 and 1992) and was ranked number 1 in doubles for five weeks in 1992. Grabb played Davis Cup for the United States in 1992 and won the doubles title in Tel Aviv in 1995.

"To say the least, I've earned a better living at tennis ($3 million in career earnings) than anything else and I want to keep at it as long as I can," said Grabb.

"I've worked with Brad for over five years. Brad knows more about the game than anyone else and he has settled me down when I thought my career was at an end," said Agassi at the Canadian Open. (Agassi's four titles in 1998 raised his ranking from number 122 to 11.)

Gilbert is best known as one of the three Jewish players who made tennis history (along with Jay Berger and Aaron Krickstein) by becoming the first Jewish trio to lead the United States to the Davis Cup in 1990.

"I've won 20 singles titles and was ranked as high as fourth in the rankings, but the Davis Cup victory is my most treasured memory," said Gilbert.

Drop Shots: Pete Sampras, the current number 2 player and perhaps the best player of all time, may have played at the Maccabiah Games in Israel for Canada had circumstances been different. His father is Jewish and his mother lived in Canada briefly when she was 24.

"I ended up born in the U.S. and raised in the Greek Orthodox religion," said Sampras.

Toronto team to Detroit

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — A team of 98 athletes will represent Toronto at the Jewish Community Centre Maccabi Games in Detroit later this month, says Grant Smith, one of two delegation heads.

The 70 boys and 28 girls ages 13 to 16 years-old, 60 percent of whom are members of either the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) or the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), will join 20 coaches at the games Aug. 16 to 24, says Smith, the BJC's program supervisor.

The Toronto team, which Smith says is consistently "one of the biggest" and "one of the best," will join Canadian teams from Montreal Hamilton and Ottawa; teams from U.S. cities like Los Angeles, Dallas and New York; and national teams from places like Great Britain, Israel and Mexico.

Participants did not need to be BJC or Bloor JCC members to attend the tryouts held last March for the various team sports, says Smith. The only requirement is that one parent be Jewish.

"This is our most successful outreach program for Jewish teens," he says.

Toronto will compete in boys and girls basketball, tennis, track and field, swimming, and table tennis, as well as boys baseball, soccer and beach volleyball.

Four-player beach volleyball is a medal sport for the first time at these games (regular volleyball has six players per side, and standard beach volleyball has two).

Unfortunately, there are only seven teams competing, says Smith, including two from Toronto, which received permission to send two five-member teams after having selected a 10-member team thinking regular volleyball would be played.

Smith says the Toronto delegation is still looking for sponsorships to help subsidize the cost of sending athletes – each of whom pay $665 for transportation, accommodation and other expenses – "because for every big athletic thing like this, we're always in the red."

This year's Toronto team will have its team uniform for the opening ceremonies – to be held at the Palace in Auburn Hills Michigan, home of the NBA's Detroit Pistons – supplied by Roots, complete with "poor boy hats" similar to those worn by the Canadian Olympic team at the 1998 Nagano winter games.

Athletes get to keep the five-piece ensemble after the games.

"There's no medal given out for the best uniform, but I think we're going to win it hands down," Smith says.

שם סידרות הדיג: שלוש נובלות

About families

Dear Susan,

I have a 10-year-old son who has Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD). This was confirmed recently by a psychiatrist. He was prescribed Ritalin because he behaves in a scattered and disorganized manner. Although he is coping well with the disorder, he is often the victim of people's misconceptions about kids with ADD, and about Ritalin.

Dear Reader,

There are three basic types of Attention Deficit Disorder – hyperactive, hypoactive and inattentive. Based on what you have said, I would suggest that your son is part of the third group, which is often the most overlooked. First you need to have a comprehensive assessment done in order to confirm or disconfirm the diagnosis. The inattentive types are often the least likely to be identified because they tend to be the most effective at coping. They usually demonstrate good social skills and tend to successfully master academic tasks until a later age.

The media has been largely responsible for perpetuating myths about the first two groups as well as about the benefits and pitfalls of Ritalin. The psychiatric community is also divided about ADD and the best treatment approaches.

I am a believer in multi-faceted assessment. School reports from day 1 should be studied both for achievement and for any editorial comments that could be relevant. I look for themes that are consistent throughout the years.

Psychological testing is helpful, but these children frequently underscore on the relevant parameters. Since the testing is usually administered on a one-on-one basis, the noise and distractions usually found outside the test environment will not come into play.

A structured interview with the child and parents separately is helpful in terms of assessing history and development. The inattentive group are the most difficult to test because only 30 percent respond to Ritalin. The other 60 percent live constantly with a level of anxiety or depression and will therefore respond more favorably to anti-anxiety and/or anti-depressant drugs. Blood levels and careful monitoring should be a key part of the Ritalin protocol.

Ritalin is not the panacea to the problem, and other approaches must also be utilized. A structured home and school program will assist the child in developing and maintaining a set of coping skills that will compensate for the ADD. A multi-disciplinary approach is not accepted by many clinicians, with the result that you will often have to struggle to ensure all of your son's need are met.

Swiss settle out of court

But how will compensation be disbursed?

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It remains to be seen how the $1.25-billion (US) settlement reached last week between Switzerland and claimants to Holocaust-era assets will be distributed.

But the lawyer representing claims in Canada fears the Swiss have made a deft move: By settling out of court, says Sergio Karas, "they have transformed this from a Swiss problem to a Jewish problem."

For Karas, who represents 25 Canadians seeking compensation from Swiss banks, the complex task of disbursing the huge settlement is only now beginning.

The money, which amounts to nearly $2 billion Cdn, will be paid out over three years. The historic deal is in exchange for the dropping of all legal claims, including those involving dormant accounts, against private Swiss banks, among them the two largest, UBS AG and Credit Suisse.

The deal also puts an end to potentially crippling sanctions threatened against the Swiss by New York City, New York State and California.

The agreement covers material assets, including dormant bank accounts and securities the Nazis stole from Jews.

Some reports said it also covers all claims against the Swiss government and Swiss industry.

Karas believes it does not include claims against the Swiss National Bank; thus, the question of looted gold is still up in the air.

As well, Karas said, the deal does not include claims against Swiss insurance companies, which are likely to face additional pressure in the coming months.

But the bigger issue, as he sees it, is how to make sure the sum is disbursed fairly without creating a Jewish bureaucratic quagmire.

"We have heard rumors that the World Jewish Congress (WJC) was pushing for some of the money to go to the needy," Karas told The CJN. "[But] we want to see account holders or their heirs compensated first and foremost, and the rest distributed to all Holocaust survivors.

"We want money to go to [claimants] now. You can't carve [some] out for the poor. No criteria for poverty should be applied."

He added: "We don't want to see a bureaucratic infrastructure created. We don't want some Jewish bureaucrat in New York, or some committee, making decisions."

Karas said the "proper" thing to do is to designate a large accounting firm to distribute the funds.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Lay Cantor Deported

TORONTO — A former Metro-area lay cantor who was convicted on several sex-related offences has been deported to France.

In 1996, he was sentenced to five years in prison for sexually abusing a boy who attended the synagogue where Oziel was a cantor.

The Ontario Court of Appeal later reduced the sentence to two years, citing Oziel's poor health.

Sue Dobrin, a spokesperson for the Immigration Department, told The CJN that Oziel, who had been a permanent resident, was deported because of his criminal conviction.

CJC Offers Condolences

TORONTO — Keith Landy, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was among the 12,000 mourners who attended the funeral of William Hancox, the Toronto undercover police officer slain while on duty.

CJC also sent a letter of condolence to Police Chief William Boothby.

Ad Campaign Launched

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) last week announced the start of a national media campaign to create "greater understanding of Jerusalem as the eternal, undivided capital of Israel."

The campaign will begin with a series of television commercials on local Toronto stations. BBC says 1.2 million people will view the ads.

Delegation To S. America

WINDSOR — A delegation from Windsor's Jewish community will travel to Argentina and Brazil next week to learn more about those countries' Jewish centres.

Spokesperson Ruth Liebman says the local community is concerned about the plight of the communities in the two countries, and will encourage Jews from there to immigrate to Windsor.

ISRAEL

Oslo Invite Turned Down

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week turned down an invitation from the Norwegian government to attend the fifth anniversary commemoration of the Oslo accords. An aide said Netanyahu "thought it would not look good if he attended, when the Oslo work is not completed here."

Former prime minister Shimon Peres and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat plan to attend the Aug. 23-24 events in the Norwegian capital.

Draft Budget Approved

JERUSALEM —Israel's cabinet approved a draft of the 1999 budget. Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman is proposing a budget of about $62 billion (US) that shifts priorities from battling inflation to boosting economic growth and employment. He set an inflation target at four percent, down from this year's estimate of seven to 10 percent.

But labor and social affairs minister Eliyahu Yishai stormed out of the meeting after charging that the budget would not help the country's growing unemployment.

WORLD

Cantor Arrested

LOS ANGELES — Stuart Friedman, a former cantor at Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax, was arrested this month in Los Angeles on charges of distributing child pornography.

He appeared in court last week in his native Baltimore, charged with mailing a computer disk from Halifax to California. The disk is alleged to contain explicit material.

Friedman, 43, was convicted of possessing child pornography in Halifax last year, and fined $2,000. He now faces a maximum sentence of 15 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Clinton To Visit Moscow

WASHINGTON — Thirty-four members of the U.S. Congress have urged President Bill Clinton to visit a Jewish site in Moscow when he travels to the Russian capital next month for a scheduled summit with President Boris Yeltsin. Such a visit would "make clear our commitment to countering ethnic hatred and anti-Semitism in Russia," the congressmen wrote in a letter. White House officials had no immediate comment on the president's travel plans.

Delay Memorial Decision

BONN — Germany's opposition candidate for chancellor called for delaying any decision on a proposed national Holocaust memorial here until after the Sept. 27 national elections. Gerhard Schroeder said he would handle the project differently than Chancellor Helmut Kohl, who is trailing in the polls.

Schroeder also said he believed Germany's former concentration camps would have more impact as memorials than any monument designed by an artist.

Driver Taken To Court

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's anti-racism unit is taking a Buenos Aires bus driver to court for assaulting a 14-year-old Jewish boy. Witnesses who came to the boy's aid said the driver tried to push him and threw his kippah off the bus after shouting, "No Jews get on my bus."

The bus company is also investigating the incident.

Messianic newspaper hits Toronto area – again

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A U.S.-based messianic movement has made good on its pledge to locally distribute its newspaper, which urges Jews to worship Jesus as their messiah.

Some 5,000 copies of the Messianic Times were hand-delivered to Jewish homes in Downsview, Willowdale and Thornhill to help spread the group's message.

After handing out over 1,000 copies of its spring edition in Toronto, the paper pledged it would distribute five times that many copies of its summer issue here.

The professional-looking 32-page publication can easily be mistaken for a mainstream Jewish newspaper. It is filled with color photographs and articles on Jewish life, synagogues and Israel. A careful read, however, shows the paper's central thrust: that "Yeshua" (Jesus) is the "true" Jewish messiah.

People who got the paper "are really upset," said Julius Ciss, director of Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group. "[The paper] clearly shows the global scale of the messianic problem. It illustrates vividly what we've been trying to tell community for decades. Maybe this is the jolt the community needs."

The slick quarterly bills itself as the world's only international messianic Jewish newspaper. It was founded in Toronto in 1990, and was immediately denounced as another tool to convert Jews, especially Russian immigrants, to Christianity. Founder Zev Isaacs moved the operation to Bryn Mawr, Pa. in 1995.

Asked about the Toronto distribution, Isaacs said he would fax The CJN some quotes so the reporter could not "twist" facts.

"I think your attitude stinks," Isaacs said, and hung up the telephone.

5,000 copies

In his fax, Isaacs said the Messianic Times was distributed in Toronto's Jewish community "to educate Jewish people on what Judaism is: a personal relationship with the Living God of Israel."

One "problem" in the Toronto Jewish community, Isaacs' fax continued, is that Reform, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis "are not teaching their congregations about messianic prophecies in the Tanach.

"The Messiah has always been a central theme within Judaism and it is only the Messiah himself as explained in Isaiah: 53 who can take away the sins of the Jewish people in Toronto and give them everlasting life."

Isaacs said he believes "it is a matter of life and death for each Jewish person in Toronto…to personally find God and the Messiah of Israel, Yeshua."

"It presents another point of view," he said. "People may not agree with it but it's the actual picture. It's an eye-opener. It presents the messianic movement for what it is."

Jack Farber, the congregation's spiritual leader, said the paper was handed out to Jewish homes to counteract "the bad press" messianic Judaism has been getting, and to show that it's "not a fringe, lunatic movement of a few people, but [rather] an international organization that should be given some credibility."

Rabbi Michael Skobac

Although he said he's also received several calls from people "disturbed" by the newspaper, Rabbi Michael Skobac, the director of education of Jews for Judaism, said this is just the latest offensive by the messianic movement.

"This sort of thing goes on all the time," he told The CJN. "It's just another manifestation of missionary activity. There are lots of other things going on, by dozens of groups in and around Toronto.

"We have to keep our eye on the ball, and this isn't the ball."

He said the missionary movement considers Toronto and York Region fertile ground.

One way to guard against all this proselytizing, he said, is "to strengthen ourselves Jewishly."

Jews for Judaism is asking the public to mail the Messianic Times or any other messianic literature to it care of 2795 Bathurst St., Box 41032, Toronto, M6B 4J6, or to drop material off at its office in the Main Exchange Plaza at 800 Steeles Ave. West, Thornhill.

Common legal cultures

Canadians should be deeply interested in the young, evolving judicial/legal system of Israel.

For almost a decade, many of this country's most incisive, brilliant, and thoughtful legal minds – judges, professors and lawyers – have been actively involved with Israeli counterparts in exchanging constitutional law ideas and, in particular, in sharing the cumulative wisdom from the still relatively novel Canadian Charter of Rights experience.

In May, Canadian and Israeli jurists met at Tel Aviv University for a three-day Canada-Israel Law Conference. The theme of the conference was Litigating the Values of a Nation and was organized by the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme, a consortium that includes Canadian law schools from McGill University, University of Toronto and the University of Alberta. (See The CJN, May 28.)

It was the third such conference since 1992. As McGill Prof. Irwin Cotler told the delegates in Tel Aviv, there is a "strong connection between the legal cultures of Canada and Israel.

"Both Canada and Israel are parliamentary democracies," Cotler elaborated. "Both are exploring the possibility of judicial review in an evolving constitutional democracy. Both are mixed jurisdictions enjoying a civil and common law heritage. Both eschew in constitutional and cultural terms the absolute separation of church and state... Both are concerned with group rights, as well as individual rights. Both are multicultural democracies...grappling with the role and rights of not only linguistic and cultural minorities, but national minorities, the francophonie national minority in Canada and the Arab national minority in Israel."

The parallels between the two legal cultures is unlike any within the democratic, western world. As a result, as Cotler pointed out, "there is a particular relevance for Canada, as Israel evolves the notion of the meaning of Jewish and democratic state." (My emphasis)

Adding to that relevance is the involvement of a number of Canadians in the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists (IAJLJ).

The IAJLJ is a non-political group of Jewish jurists from around the world. It plays no "hard-edged" substantive jurisprudential role in relation to either courts or to governments. It is chiefly a social and educational organization.

Nevertheless, the association does perform the symbolically meaningful role of bringing together Jews from around the world to discuss issues of law, human rights and justice. Its bulletins are invaluable sources of information on legal developments in Israel and on Jewish law.

The association was founded in Jerusalem in late August 1969 as a result of a deep stirring among Jewish jurists throughout the Jewish world in the wake of the Six Day War, to explore common trans-national legal problems on the basis of shared trans-national Jewish experience.

At the association's first annual congress in 1969, some 350 representatives from 20 different countries attended. The objectives of the non-political organization were broadly defined in the following terms: "To study and seek solutions to the legal problems of common interest to Jews all over the world, and those concerning the State of Israel in particular."

Six Canadians were among the founding members of the association: Cotler and Norman May as vice-presidents; Justice Bora Laskin, Philip Givens, Prof. Henry Molot and Mark Rosenstein as members of the executive committee.

There are two Canadians among the association's officers today: Bert Raphael and Isidore Wolf. Cotler is its special counsel. The president of the association is Hadassah Ben-Ito.

The association's publication, is called Justice. It is always an interesting compendium of articles, commentaries and features on the most up-to-date developments in Israeli law and on legal matters of unique relevance to the Jewish people wherever situate.

The summertime issue of Justice arrived recently on my desk. It features interviews with the president of the Israel's Supreme Court, Aharon Barak and with Justice Menachem Elon, both of whom reflect on Israel's legal system 50 years after it was created.

Chief Justice Barak is a world-renowned scholar. He has spent considerable time studying and teaching in Canada. Indeed, he is scheduled to return to Canada for a special lecture series in the near future.

Chief Justice Barak is regarded as a judicial activist in Israel. But his activism is not popular in all circles. Earlier this year threats were uttered against him by extremists in the haredi community, forcing him to move about under constant personal protection.

Because of the "particular relevance for Canada" in Israel's evolving legal system, as described by Cotler and as manifested by the ongoing exchange of legal scholars, I shall excerpt some of the observations by Chief Justice Barak and Justice Elon in next week's column.

Murdered businessman donated to Jewish causes

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A prominent Toronto businessman who was shot to death last week in a shocking daylight murder was active in the Jewish community.

Frank Roberts, 68, donated to the United Jewish Appeal, the Baycrest Foundation and many other Jewish and non-Jewish causes.

Roberts, who made millions with his invention, the Obus Forme backrest, was at one time, a member Temple Har Zion in Thornhill. He had been a member of Holy Blossom Temple until 1996.

Rabbi Michael Stroh, spiritual leader of Temple Har Zion, told The CJN that Roberts had been instrumental in forming the temple's brotherhood.

"He was easy to deal with and good to his employees," said Rabbi Stroh, who delivered the eulogy at Roberts' funeral last Sunday. "He was very charitable."

Roberts also contributed to Beit Halochem (Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel), Jewish National Fund and She'arim, a school for children with special needs.

Frank Roberts

"He was a fine gentleman," said Saul Feldberg, president of Global Upholstery, which manufacturers Obus Forme backrests under licence. "He was always polite and full of energy."

At a 1996 golf tournament sponsored by Jewish National Fund and Reena Foundation, Roberts donated backrests to all participants.

He was a sponsor of this spring's annual Baycrest gala, where he presented comedy legends Mel Brooks and Carl Reiner with personalized Obus Forme backrests.

Roberts was shot to death in the parking lot of his factory where he had just arrived for work on the morning of Aug. 13. More than a dozen police officers and homicide detectives scoured the scene but as of last week, police had few clues.

Police issued a call to the public for help with the case.

Roberts was born in Boston and had been a prisoner of the Chinese during the Korean War. He came to Canada in 1959.

He came up with the idea for a portable backrest after suffering a back injury in a tennis game. Obus Forme Ltd. was founded in 1980 and has sold millions of the trademark pain-relieving backrests in 26 countries.

The company's sales were estimated at $200 million annually.

Roberts was widely praised as a generous, kind man who took an interest in all his employees and his many charitable activities.

He leaves three ex-wives; sons Brian and David, daughter Joy and 13 grandchildren.

Goldstone remains active at 85

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Monty Goldstone, 85, has 20-20 eyesight and is a volunteer driver for the Hebrew Club for the Blind.

An ardent advocate of "life begins at 80," Goldstone devotes six days out of seven to volunteering for Jewish causes.

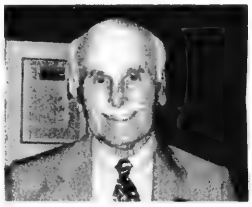
On Tuesday he works with the Men's Service Group at Baycrest Hospital, and helps Adath Israel Brotherhood sponsor brunches at Baycrest Centre. He is also involved with the mazel tov entertainments once a month there.

On Wednesdays he visits members of the Adath Israel Brotherhood living in retirement homes at Lifestyle, Greenview and Donway.

On Sundays he is available for whatever comes along and a lot usually does.

"I wouldn't have time for all the volunteer work if I wasn't a bachelor," he said.



Monty Goldstone

Born in England, he was a manager with Marks and Spencer for many years, and in Toronto he was with Belmont Property Management for 17 years. He spent five years as a professional tour escort before he retired 13 years ago.

The North York resident was given a 20-20 eyesight rating at his recent driving test and gained 80 out of 100 on his written exam.

Standing 5 foot 5 and weighing 146 pounds, Goldstone says he is in good health, has never had cataracts, but gave up golf two years ago because of the expense of renting a cart and high green fees.

"People at age 80 and beyond have a lot they can do and I encourage them to get out and do it," he said.

Shabbaton a first for Jewish deaf community

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The president of the Toronto Jewish Association for the Deaf (TJAD) said that when he was growing up in Windsor, he often felt left out of religious celebrations because there were no special programs to make Judaism accessible to deaf children.

Now in his mid-30s, Alan Cheifetz said he had to struggle through a Sunday school program and had no way of understanding synagogue services.

"No [sign] interpreters were provided for me. I would go to High Holiday services. I didn't know what was going on. I missed out on a lot."

Cheifetz said his experience typified that of many deaf Jews who often feel isolated from worship and holiday celebrations because they cannot participate fully in synagogue services for the hearing.

He said he plans to reach out to those Jews through TJAD's first Shabbaton, to be held in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary Aug. 28 to 30 at the Howard Johnston Hotel in Scarborough. He stressed that the Shabbaton is for all Jewish deaf throughout the Greater Toronto Area (GTA) regardless of their religious affiliation.

"This weekend for the deaf is the first of its kind in the country where deaf Jews can meet each other, plug into their Jewishness and celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary."

What makes this inaugural Shabbaton particularly unique is that it will be lead by two deaf rabbis, Cheifetz said. "This weekend is significant. For one thing the deaf Jews of Toronto can look up to one of their own who has an insider's viewpoint of deafness; second, a deaf rabbi demonstrates that the deaf can do anything they set their minds to."

Rabbi Chaim Tzvi Kakon

Rabbi David Rabinowitz

Each of the two rabbis have a connection to Toronto, Dr. Hartley Bressler, TJAD's chair of development, told The CJN.

Rabbi David Rabinowitz, the first deaf rabbi ordained in the United States, is a descendant of a long line of distinguished rabbis and is the grandson of Rabbi Naftoli Tzvi Horowitz, who was a rabbi in Toronto.

Rabbi Chaim Tzvi Kakon, Rabbi Rabinowitz's grandson, grew up in Detroit, but attended Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva, where he graduated as valedictorian.

Bressler said both he and Rabbi Kakon share the same dream: to set up a Jewish educational institute for deaf children so they can have the same access to day school education as other Jewish children.

One of the biggest obstacles for deaf Jews is their limited knowledge of Judaism, Bressler said, drawing an analogy to Jews from the former Soviet Union, many of whom never received a Jewish education in their homeland.

The Shabbaton will expose participants to "a unique Shabbat service that will be unlike anything else in North America."

But there's an "interesting twist," Bressler added. "While the services are geared to the deaf, organizers are making sure that the hearing people feel included. For the benefit of the hearing people in attendance, there will be voice translation [of the signing]."

Both Bressler and Cheifetz expressed gratitude to UJA Federation's action committee on Jewish continuity, which awarded TJAD a $15,000 grant to subsidize the Shabbaton. It makes the retreat more affordable for participants and offsets the cost of bringing the rabbis and their families from the United States to Toronto, they explained.

In addition to prayer services, children's programs and entertainment by a mime and a magician, the Shabbaton will also include workshops on being Jewish and deaf, as well as lectures by guest speakers such as York University humanities professor Dr. Carl Ehrlich, Marc Bookbinder of UJA Federation and Dr. Arnold Noyek, executive director of the Isabel Silverman Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO).

For more information about the Shabbaton call Joely Bernstein at 416-785-7949, or e-mail her at [joely@palomablanca.com]. Or contact Shabbaton co-chair Jack Osten via TTY at 416-756-9951.

CORRECTION

In last week's article about Judy Engel, she was incorrectly referred to as the 1998 UJA Women's Campaign chair. She is the 1999 UJA Women's Campaign chair. Agi Mandell was the 1998 chair. The CJN regrets the error.

Hearings for alleged Nazi war criminals

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Deportation hearings against two suspected Nazi war criminals are scheduled to take place in the coming weeks.

A hearing to determine whether Ludwig Nebel should be deported for concealing his Nazi past is scheduled Aug. 28 in Niagara Falls, where Nebel lives. Immigration officials have suggested the hearing be transferred to Toronto.

Nebel, who is not a Canadian citizen, is alleged to have taken part in a "resettlement" of between 200 and 250 Jews who were handed over to the Gestapo in the Galician town of Sambor.

According to the war crimes unit, Nebel joined the Nazi party in Austria in 1933 and the SS in 1938.

And deportation proceedings against Wasily Bogutin of Toronto, 89, will take place this fall, perhaps as soon as next month, officials say.

In a rare move, the federal cabinet stripped Bogutin of his Canadian citizenship last month and ordered him to face a deportation hearing.

Last February, the Federal Court of Canada ruled that Bogutin lied about his activities in Nazi-occupied Ukraine when he immigrated to Canada in 1951.

The court, which had even convened in Ukraine to gather evidence against him, found Bogutin gained entry to Canada "by false representation or fraud."

The Justice Department's war crimes unit has launched 15 cases since 1995, when Ottawa shifted away from criminal trials to denaturalizing and deporting suspects.

Bogutin's case was the first of those to go to court. He is alleged to have served in a police district in the Ukraine and collaborated with the occupying Nazis.

Accusations against him include participating in the murder of civilians, deporting civilians to camps in Germany and rounding up people for use as slave laborers for the Nazis.

Bogutin would be only the third suspected Nazi war criminal to be deported from Canada. Konrads Kalejs of Toronto was a visitor and was deported last year, while Jacob Luitjens was deported to Holland in 1992.

Two other suspects, Ladislaus Csatari of Toronto and Monerts Maciukas of St. Lambert, Que., were also stripped of their Canadian citizenship. Csatari left voluntarily last year, while Maciukas has said he would not contest the government's action.

Three suspects – Antanas Kenstavicius, Josef Nemsila and Erichs Tobiass – have died.

The trials of two suspects, Vladimir Katriuk of Montreal and Peteris Vitols of Toronto, have ended and are awaiting judgment.

According to war crimes unit director Paul Vickery, six cases will begin between now and December: those of Nebel, Helmut Oberlander of Kitchener, Johann Dueck of St. Catharines, Wasyl Odynsky of Scarborough, Michael Baumgartner of Windsor, and Eduards Podins of Burnaby, B.C.

Justice department and Federal Court officials are in Riga, Latvia this month to gather evidence against Podins, 80. He is alleged to have been a police officer in the Valmiera camp in Latvia, where political prisoners were confined, tortured and executed.

He's also alleged to have lied about his past when he entered Canada.

Cowards

Terrorists are cowards. They live in shadows, faceless murderers who cringe in the full light but find purpose and meaning in the sly, stealthy slaughter of defenseless victims, men, women, children, babies.

Cowardice is not only their modus operandi; it is part of their very deep essence. Behind a mask, behind a slogan or behind the protective shelter of evil governments and craven despots, they are always hiding.

Two weeks ago, 257 people were killed in the bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi, Kenya and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. More than 5,000 people were injured. Last week, a car bomb tore to shreds 28 people in Omagh, Northern Ireland. More than 220 people were injured.

In greeting the IDF's Home Front Command rescue team last week upon its return to Israel from the bombed-out rubble in Nairobi, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu spoke an irreducible truth about terrorism when he said: "It was not just our war, or that of the U.S., Kenya or Tanzania, but that of the whole democratic world."

Indeed, no country has been or is immune from terrorism. The murderers have found new shadows in which to hide and new victims to kill or to maim on the streets of Europe, South America, the United States, Africa, the Middle East and Asia.

Is it then, not past the time for the peace loving, law abiding, decent countries of the world to coalesce against the perpetrators of terrorism? Is it not, finally, past the time for the peace loving, law abiding, decent countries of the world to cast out from all international trading arrangements and quasi-legislative forums the regimes that sponsor, fund or otherwise encourage terrorism?

Canada has always been in the vanguard of innovative, morality-affirming foreign policy initiatives. We therefore urge the government to undertake a new initiative. This initiative would begin the process of organizing all willing states, not only the democracies, to pressure, publicly and in the open, rather than behind the scenes, those regimes that inspire, finance and equip these cowardly, but lethal shadow dwellers.

Tangled web

We also urge the government of Canada, which has in the past stated it will do all it can to advance the Middle East peace process, to register a severe protest with Yasser Arafat regarding the Web site of Fatah, the organization he leads. As we discovered last week, Fatah's constitution opposes "any political solution offered as an alternative to demolishing Zionist occupation in Palestine." It also calls for the "complete liberation of Palestine and eradication of Zionist economic, political, military and cultural existence."

When told of its contents, Fares Kadurah, a member of Fatah's top representative body in the West Bank and a member of the Palestinian Authority, thought only to criticize the negative publicity as an Israeli stunt. He could not find the words to utterly reject and condemn the substance of the offensive language. Kadurah observed that "Fatah supports the peace process." But he added that "if we fail, we shall maintain the option of popular struggle, including reasonable violence..." No doubt the bombers in Omagh, Dar es Salaam and Nairobi also considered their own deadly handiwork to have been merely reasonable violence too.

Arafat must immediately publicly reject his movement's constitution. He must also rebuke Kadurah for his unwillingness to reject it outright. For its part, the Canadian government must immediately let Arafat know that it is vital for peace that he do so.

War crimes list does not include settlements

Gerald Steinberg, in a column titled "The UN: Still a source of hatred" (CJN, July 30), wrote: "The UN-sponsored conference [on an international criminal court in Rome from June 15 to July 17] bowed to Egyptian and Syrian pressure to include 'settlements in occupied territories' in the list of war crimes."

I was a member of the Canadian delegation to the Rome conference as a nongovernmental adviser and had a chance to follow the proceedings closely. I am mystified by Steinberg's quote.

What most closely approximates the Steinberg quote is a provision in the draft statute used for negotiating purposes throughout the conference, which had as an option that the definition of war crimes include "the establishment of settlers in an occupied territory and changes to the demographic composition of an occupied territory." This option was rejected by the conference and is not in the statute as approved.

I accept the general drift of Steinberg's article that the UN is still a source of hatred towards Israel. However, for that criticism of the UN to be convincing, it must be accurate.

Can't break into 'closed' Toronto scene

I was much moved to read the letter about the position of Jewish singles recently arrived in Toronto. (CJN, Aug. 6) It is a terrible thing that single Jewish men and women have come to a populous Jewish centre and have to remain single, unattached and without partners, never to have children. But perhaps this is not only a Jewish concern. Did someone say that Jews take on the attributes of their environment? Perhaps they have to.

My wife and I came to Toronto 20 years ago, after she retired from a successful teaching career at McGill University. Her French was poor, and she wished to continue her work professionally.

Knowing only former Montrealers, we tried to get acquainted with Toronto people. To this end, we would from time to time invite people we had met, for dinner and a pleasant evening. My wife was an excellent cook and an excellent hostess.

The invitees were a mix of Jew and gentile. Over the years, we thus entertained probably more than 60 or 70 such couples, separately or in a small group. Everyone said they had a lovely dinner, a most enjoyable evening, and left. We never saw one of them again, though one woman did come back to retrieve an umbrella she had left behind.

Now I may be traducing Torontonians, but during our many years in Montreal, whenever we invited people for an evening, everyone, without exception, would sooner or later invite us back, whether for dinner or otherwise. We thus formed many good and lasting friendships that lasted even after we left Montreal.

Does this mean that Montrealers are different from Torontonians, perhaps more warm-blooded, perhaps less shy to get close to strangers? The answer is beyond me. More than once I have heard from recently arrived South Africans, of the impossibility for them to break into Toronto circles.

It means that Jewish singles, many of them lovely people, will have a hard time finding suitable partners, when they come from outside Toronto. It's a great pity for all of us.

Letters to Arafat a waste of time

Re: Editorial, "Set an Example" (CJN, July 30).

Send a letter to Yasser Arafat?

As a former president of a B'nai Brith Lodge and a former spokesperson for the CZO, I find CPMJO's (Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations) and your naivete hard to believe.

What would Arafat's response to your letters mean?

Is it possible The CJN hasn't read what Arafat has said repeatedly? What part of "Don't believe anything I say or anything I sign" isn't clear?

Recalling Zionism's Sephardi names

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

Imbued with ideas such as historian Jacob Talmon's that "the State of Israel is a direct continuation of the culture and society created by the secular Jews of eastern Europe," there has been very little recognition given to the events or the people of the pre-1880s aliyot – the Sephardi Zionists who, as urban pioneers, helped build many Israeli cities.

Historians have also ignored those who, impelled by faith and a strong love for Zion, have throughout the centuries, alone, with their families or with their whole communities, undertaken the always arduous and sometimes dangerous trip to Palestine, by foot or on horseback, not always lucky enough or strong enough to reach their much-cherished destination.

At the time of Israel's 50th birthday, no doubt Theodor Herzl, Max Nordau (both of whom, incidentally, asserted that they were of Sephardi ancestry), Menachem Begin and Zev Jabotinsky will often be mentioned, and rightly so. However, such Spanish kabbalistic and literary figures as Avraham Abulafia, Dona Gracia Nasi and Moshe Zacuto will likely not be mentioned, and if they were, they would be unknown to most people.

A crucial characteristic of Sephardi Zionism is, according to Hebrew University Prof. Daniel Elazar, its "unquestioned merging of religious and political aspirations. Having never undergone secularization…or embraced otherworldly pietism…unlike the Ashkenazim of the modern epoch, the Sephardi world was earlier attuned to seeking political solutions to the Jewish condition, at the same time never divorcing such solutions from a deep religious commitment."

Nowhere is this better exemplified than in the extraordinary life of Dona Gracia Nasi, (1510-1569). Born in a Marrano family, Dona Gracia returned to Judaism, settled first in Turkey and later in Tiberias, where, with her nephew Joseph Nasi (1524-1579), Duke of Naxos, she worked tirelessly to help the new immigrants who had come, often on foot, from North Africa or the Middle East.

Palestine was then part of the Ottoman Empire, and Dona Gracia and Joseph Nasi, who were personal friends of the Turkish sultan, Suleiman the Magnificent, used their influence and their enormous fortune to help their coreligionists and to rebuild Tiberias. When Joseph Nasi died, Solomon ibn Yaish (Abenaes), another very successful financier and friend of Suleiman, continued his work.

Sephardim consider the merging of religious and political activities as an inherent element of their Jewishness. This is why they have not produced a Neturei Karta (an anti-Zionist religious group), nor a Hashomer Hatzair (a revolutionary, anti-religious, social movement). Such groups found good breeding ground for their supporters in the authoritarian regimes collapsing all over central and eastern Europe and the Balkans. This is also why the Balkan Sephardi communities were able to successfully develop Zionist organizations.

In Africa and Asia, however, the authoritarian regimes were stable and extremely wary of any threat to them; thus there was no room for sociopolitical movements such as Zionism. There were, however, underground Zionist movements whose glorious stories have yet to be told.

In the 18th and 19th centuries in Iraq, for example, leaders of the Somech, Gabbai, Sassoon, Kadouri and Yehuda families, among others, built such strong communities that in the early 20th century, they were able to form Zionist organizations all over the country. After the demise of the British Mandate, they had to go underground and they were able to set up committees for secret emigration.

In The Exiled and the Redeemed, former Israeli president Yitzchak Ben-Zvi, who understood the importance of Sephardi Zionism, pointed out that Jews from Iraq had given "with munificence" to the Yishuv by building villages and founding yeshivot. He also wrote that Persian Jews were among the first Sephardim to settle in Palestine in the 1880s, "establishing special quarters and sending their sons to work on the land…The thousands of Kurdish Jews who came to the land of Israel long before the Zionist movement were among the first agricultural workers in Galilee settlements. They constituted the core of the Jerusalem working class at a time when many in the old Yishuv largely depend on the charity of their coreligionists abroad."

As urban pioneers, Sephardim have been deeply involved in rebuilding Jerusalem, Safed, Tiberias and Hebron. These cities had traditionally attracted a high intellectual elite from the Sephardi communities of the Mediterranean Basin, thus triggering a revival of Jewish intellectual and cultural life in Palestine.

Spanish and Bukharan Jews financed by an American Sephardi, Judah Touro, and led by an English Sephardi, Moses Montefiore, helped build the first settlements outside the Old City of Jerusalem. In the early 20th century, Salonika Jews built the port of Haifa, and Sephardim were to be found in great numbers in entrepreneurial activities in Jaffa and Tel Aviv.

After 1948, they continued to be involved in the development of new urban centres. As Elazar has explained, a fundamental difference between Ashkenazi and Sephardi Zionism is that "the former demanded internal revolution as much as a transformation of the Jewish condition, while the latter was a Zionism of redemption that sought continuity with tradition and did not require revolution."

I will mention only a few of the most well-known Sephardim whose Zionism was deeply imbued with spirituality and tradition.

Yehuda Halevi (1075?-1141?), author of, among other works, the Kuzari and the Zionides, had a love for Zion of such intensity that in September 1140, he left Cordoba for Palestine. It is not known whether he ever reached his beloved Holy Land. In his single most often quoted poem, one can read such famous verses as these:

"My heart is in the East and I in the uttermost West./ How can I find savor in food? How can it be sweet to me?/ How light in my eyes to leave the bounty of Spain;/ How bright in my eyes the dust of the shrine again."

This untitled poem was eventually included in the liturgy of Tisha b'Av, and Naomi Shemer borrowed a verse from it for her song Yerushalayim Shel Zahav: "I am a harp for thy songs."

Fleeing from forced conversion to Islam, the Rambam landed on May 1165 in Acco, albeit for only five months, because the region was then in the hands of the ruthless European Christian Crusaders.

Both Benjamin of Tudela and David Rubeni, well-known travellers of the 12th and 16th centuries respectively, included Palestine in their itinerary. Rubeni even openly stated that it was time for the Jews to raise an army and take Jerusalem and the whole of Palestine back from the Muslims.

Communal leader Moses Nachmanides (1194-1270) had to flee Spain after his thorny disputation with Pablo Cristiani. He went to Acco and from there to Haifa where he died.

Kabbalist Abraham Abulafia (1240- after 1291), deeply convinced that members of the Ten Lost Tribes had been exiled along the Sambatyon, went to Palestine in 1260 looking for the famous river and for his brethren.

Abraham Zacuto (1452-1515?), whose perfected astrolabe and astronomical tables were used by Christopher Columbus, refused conversion in 1497, fled from Portugal and spent a few years in Tunis before moving to Jerusalem.

Joseph Caro (1489-1575), famous kabbalist and author of the Shulchan Aruch, moved to Safed in 1535. There one of his students was Moses Cordovero (1522-1570), the prominent kabbalist.

Rabbi Jacob Berab ordained Joseph Caro and Caro then spread the study of Kabbalah from North Africa to Safed.

Closer to our time, we must mention the following:

Albert Cohen (1895-1981), a famous Sephardi writer and Nobel prize nominee was born in Corfu. He had such a deep lifelong involvement with Chaim Weizmann and Zionism that, in September 1979, a forest planted in the outskirts of Jerusalem was named in his honor.

Moses Montefiore (1784-1885), famous philanthropist and ardent Zionist, gave generously to Jewish, Christian and Muslim charities in Palestine. He created farm villages so that the Jews could work the land; he introduced industry, printing presses, flour mills and textiles; he built Yemin Moshe, today one of the most prestigious neighborhoods in Jerusalem.

Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881), a romantic Zionist, wrote in his novel Tancred about "those days of political justice when Jerusalem belonged to the Jews." He played an important role in the parliamentary struggle for Jewish emancipation and often expressed very strong Zionist feelings.

Finally, a few families worth mentioning:

The Hanegbi rabbinic family lived in Hebron for at least 500 years before the creation of the State of Israel.

The rabbinic family of one of Israel's most famous artists, Moshe Castel, fled Castille in 1492 for Palestine to settle in Gaza, where they lived until 1799, when Muslims and Jews fled the conquering army of Napoleon. The Castels went to Hebron, where they lived until the 1929 Arab massacre, in which Rabbi Meir Castel was murdered. The family escaped to Jerusalem.

Yitzhak Navon (b. 1921) was born into a rabbinic family that had settled in Jerusalem in the 17th century. One of the rabbis in the family served as Rishon Le-Zion. His uncle helped the first two Zionist colonies, Rishon Le-Zion and Petah-Tikvah, to secure title to their lands and he helped build several neighborhoods in Jerusalem. In 1890, to connect Jerusalem and Jaffa, he built the first railroad in Eretz Israel. In 1978, Yitzhak Navon was sworn in as president of the State of Israel.

In order to provide our children with a fair, unbiased and complete picture of the history of Zionism, I hope these names and many others will henceforth find the place they deserve in the books dealing with the subject.

Electoral reform — again?

Outsiders looking at Israel always blame its political system for all that ails that society. Especially in the last year, as the debate over the Conversion Bill has exercised Jewish communities in North America, the power available to smaller parties in the system of coalition government has again been criticized.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

In Israel itself, the perspective is somewhat different. Two years after the first experiment in direct elections of the prime minister, and two years before the next national election (if the government serves its full term), the debate over the new system, its costs and its benefits, is raging once again. In fact, a renewed, aggressive effort is underway to reverse the system to a variation on the old, one-ballot theme.

In 1996, voters were offered a new electoral system: They could cast two ballots, one for a prime ministerial candidate of their choice, and a second for a party running for the Knesset in the existing system of proportional representation. In this system, 1.5 percent of the popular vote grants a Knesset seat, thereby allowing parties that represent even tiny minority views to be elected. The decision to change the system was the culmination of more than a decade of public debate and controversy. Even when the idea garnered public support, it was opposed by many of the country's political scientists and leading political figures.

In their electoral systems, democracies seek to balance the principles of equitable representation and effective, stable governance. In its move to direct elections, Israel sought to maintain the broad representation inherent in a system of proportional representation, while improving the effectiveness of government.

Proponents of the new system argued that the clear-cut, immediate choice of prime minister would prevent the prolonged period of coalition negotiations. In effect, this had become a "buyer's market" for small parties, who had the power to determine the prime minister through a parliamentary majority. Instead, they claimed, the negotiations for a coalition would be more like a "seller's market," since small parties, especially those in the centre, would clamor to enter the government to enjoy the perks of power.

In turn, opponents of the system argued that negotiations between the "coalition-maker" and the potential partners would be even more intense than before. They would take place before the elections (to get their voters' support for the candidate), after the elections and between the first end second round of prime ministerial elections, if a second round was called for. Furthermore, they claimed, because of the split vote, even greater fragmentation would ensue. Smaller parties would gain significantly, thereby increasing their power.

Two years into the system, those opposing it seem to have gained momentum. It is true that the prime minister derives his power directly from the people and that he was able to form a government relatively quickly. But the fragmentation in Israeli politics and the reduced powers of the Knesset to check the prime minister have resulted in instability and a heightened competition among the sectoral interests within the cabinet. The combination of an extremely low threshold of representation – 1.5 percent – and the split vote, has created a Knesset that is in effect, a collection of interest groups. Sectoral interests have no incentive to come together on the basis of compromise, and the voter, in turn, can vote for a narrow interest in the Knesset ballot, since the vote for prime minister is separate.

Speaker of the Knesset Dan Tichon has already speculated that the next Knesset will have 20 parties, rather than the 15 now represented. This would be a prescription for political chaos.

As for the coalition itself, it works best with one dominant party that brings along a number of natural partners who, together, represent a broad majority. But when there are several parties virtually equal in size, the competition is so fierce as to make a common vision virtually impossible. Indeed, Netanyahu's government has been described as a "coalition of outsiders" brought together by their disaffection with the old establishment rather than through any common ground.

The new effort at electoral "re-reform" is aimed at reinstating one ballot and raising the threshold of representation. This would reduce the number of parties and the number of seats they hold, while strengthening the power of the Knesset in a parliamentary system.

A significant number of Knesset members agree, but the two key individuals, Benjamin Netanyahu and Ehud Barak, are hesitant. Both feel they stand a better chance of election in the existing, split-vote system, although they recognize the weaknesses it has created. It is unlikely that they will want to compromise their short-term interest for the greater good. Only a combination of serious public pressure and significant political will within the two large parties may force the leaders' hands.

Competing demographic forces in Israel

Twice within the past year, I have had depressing conversations with Israelis visiting Canada. Both were with long-time Jerusalemites of non-Orthodox background. They feared for the very future of the country as they understood it and knew it. To the dismay of these Jews, the Jerusalem they knew was being transformed by the growth in an Orthodox and haredi population, one which, in their perhaps alarmist view, was increasingly intolerant.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

It would seem that more and more, the religious dimension in Israel is adopting a regional pattern. Some time ago, Jerusalem Report columnist Ze'ev Chafets wrote a piece in which he advocated "partition" as a solution to the religious cleavages emerging in Israel. While his tongue was likely firmly in his cheek, it may well be that some form of territorial solution, whether cantonization à la Switzerland, other quasi-federal approaches or simply more autonomy for religious neighborhoods in major cities, may evolve.

Right now the major regional distinction seems to be between Jerusalem and the rest of the country (with some exceptions like Bnei Brak). It is increasingly common to hear secular Israelis lament the fact that they feel less comfortable in Jerusalem.

In Jerusalem, it is likely that the proportion of the Orthodox and Haredim will grow. This is due in large part to natural increase, which is much higher than among non-Orthodox Jews in Jerusalem. In addition, it seems that the factors of internal and international migration are also acting to enhance the religious dimension of Israel. Many younger Israelis from non-Orthodox backgrounds in Jerusalem seem to be moving elsewhere in Israel, at least according to anecdotal evidence. (I am unaware of official government statistics that trace the internal migration of non-Orthodox Israelis that would confirm these impressions.)

The 1998 Annual Report on Immigration and Absorption in Israel for the years 1989 to 1997 inclusive illustrates the impact of international migration. In many ways, the future character of Israel will depend on whether international migration among the non-Orthodox or natural increase among the Orthodox proves more decisive.

In the nine years under examination, almost 848,000 immigrants arrived. Of this number 722,400, or 85 percent, came from the former Soviet Union (FSU), the vast majority of them non-Orthodox and indeed rather secular. A large minority or even a majority of the remaining 126,000 immigrants may well identify with Orthodoxy of one type or another. But the overall impact of international migration would be to add to the non-Orthodox and/or secular element in Israel.

Recent immigrants as a whole comprise just 6.7 percent of the population of Jerusalem, far below their proportion within the Jewish population of Israel and that found in other Israeli cities. For example, the figures for Haifa are 18.9 percent, Beersheva 26.2 percent, and Ashkelon 80 percent.

Perhaps equally significant is the fact that the proportion of recent immigrants from the FSU, those more likely to be non-Orthodox is the lowest in Jerusalem. The figure is only 61 percent, far below the national level of 85 percent from the FSU. This reflects among other things the attraction that Jerusalem holds for Orthodox immigrants from the English-speaking world and western European. Even religious Conservative and Reform Jews from English-speaking countries find a deep attraction in Jerusalem's spirituality, despite the growing frictions with the Orthodox establishment.

The character of Jerusalem may increasingly diverge from that of other cities and regions in Israel. It is not clear what policies, if any, can or should be implemented by authorities to reverse the pattern. Israel already has entrenched patterns of regional/urban ethnic residential segregation, notably between Jews and Arabs and between Ashkenazim and Sephardim, though the latter may also reflect differences in economic class. Religious segregation should be added to the list. Given that religion may reflect the most fundamental values and cultural differences, it may be most immune from efforts at residential integration.

Residential segregation at the local or regional levels is common in most pluralistic societies, and nowadays is largely voluntaristic. It is found within many Diaspora Jewish communities. And it is not a tragedy. The cohesion of Israeli society will be determined mainly by policies at the national level, on issues such as negotiations with the Arabs or national service for the Haredim.

Jehovah's Witnesses and the Jews

Nowadays, to talk about the terrible silence of major Christian churches during the Holocaust, is like hauling coals to Newcastle. Some of the denominations – especially Protestants in Germany – have frankly owned up to their past, while others have been reticent about it.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

There was, however, one denomination that was exceptional in this regard, and it is time to recognize its exceptional role. This was the Jehovah's Witnesses, an independent Protestant denomination founded about 140 years ago in the United States that today has a worldwide membership of several million.

Many readers of this column have probably been exposed to the briefest of contacts with members of this church, when two people – often an adult and a child – rang your doorbell and tried to interest you in accepting the magazine Awake! as well as listening to some information about their religion. My doorbell too was rung a few times, and while our conversation was always brief, I found that the Witnesses were invariably courteous and took my rejection in good grace.

A word about their name. It was (and still is) the habit of some churches to render the biblical term for God as "Jehovah." This rendering is the mistaken reading of a 12th-century Christian scholar who interpreted the vocalization of the Hebrew word for the Divine Name as Jehovah. This reading was popularized in English when the King James Bible printed it in its editions.

The Witnesses make it a duty for their members to testify to their beliefs, one of which is that the nearness of a world catastrophe – the battle between good and evil – will determine the second coming of their savior. In addition, and prominently so, is the Witnesses' unswerving pacifism, an attitude which has brought them a great deal of trouble in many countries.

While other Christian denominations made the recognition of the political state the centre of their religious strategy, the Witnesses have refused to do so. This became crucial on the arrival of Hitler, when only the Witnesses were found to preach against him as a group and reject his teachings as anti-religious. Needless to say, this earned them the enmity of the Nazi state, and many of their followers became prisoners in concentration camps and suffered death.

Prof. Christine King summed it up as follows: "Jehovah's Witnesses did speak out. They spoke out from the beginning. They spoke out with one voice. And they spoke out with tremendous courage, which has a message for all of us."

Similarly, Prof. Susanna Heschel (daughter of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel and a well-known scholar in her own right) has this to say to Christian audiences when she is asked, "What could we have done?" She answers, "You could have been like Jehovah's Witnesses."

A few years ago, in August 1995, Awake! devoted an entire magazine to the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust. I have yet to see a denominational publication that has depicted the realities and horrors of the Shoah so vividly and honestly.

Kidnapping scandal helped unify Italy

Edgardo Mortara was a Jewish boy whose kidnapping played an integral role in the unification of Italy – the Risorgimento – in

By Sheldon Kirshner

1861. His abduction, on June 23, 1858, helped weaken, then finally destroy, the temporal power of the Roman Catholic Church. This, in turn, paved the way for the establishment of the modern, secular Italian state.

Despite its significance, the Mortara case, strangely enough, was given short shrift by historians, even in Italy. And the only scholarly treatment of the affair, written in 1957 by Bertram Korn, dealt exclusively with the American reaction.

With the publication of David Kertzer's magnum opus, The Kidnapping of Edgardo Mortara (Alfred A. Knopf), this startling gap has been admirably filled. Having delved into the archives and immersed himself in the literature, Kertzer, a Brown University historian and anthropologist, has produced the most comprehensive work on the topic.

The facts of the scandal are not in dispute. Born in 1851, Edgardo was the son of Momolo and Marianna Mortara, a middle-class couple from Bologna, a city falling within the boundaries of the Papal States. A few months after his birth, the family's 18-year-old illiterate servant, Anna Morisi, a pious Roman Catholic, took it upon herself to secretly baptize the sickly child. She had been told by a neighborhood grocer that, if baptized, Edgardo would "go to heaven" in the event of his death.

In the eyes of the Vatican, which regarded the conversion of the Jews as a prerequisite of the Second Coming of the Messiah, a converted Jewish child was no longer a Jew and could not remain with his or her family.

With this in mind, the Catholic inquisitor in Bologna ordered Edgardo's abduction. He was literally wrenched from his father's arms by a police posse, in total disregard of civilized norms. Yet, by Kertzer's reckoning, the brazen kidnapping was not a throwback to a darker age but was rather in keeping with Catholic dogma. As astonishing as it sounds, in 19th century Italy the taking of Jewish children from their parents was not uncommon.

Be that as it may, the Mortara kidnapping was different, since it occurred when the debate over the temporal powers of the papacy, and hence the wisdom of a theocratic state in Western Europe, was reaching a climax.

By 1858, when Italy was still a patchwork of independent principalities, the struggle for Italian unification was coming to a head.

The battle lines were clearly drawn. Traditionalists, backed by Pope Pius IX, adamantly opposed a new order within the framework of a unified state. They believed, correctly, that it would destroy their feudal privileges and power. Liberals, led by Count Camillo Cavour, prime minister of the kingdom of Sardinia, dreamed of a constitutional state in harmony with industry, science and commerce.

As Kertzer observes, the forces ranged against papal authority – the principal obstacle to national unification – gleefully regarded the Mortara case as manna from heaven. It was the perfect vehicle for demonstrating the anachronistic nature of the Vatican, centred in Rome, capital of the Papal States.

The Vatican's reactionary attitude toward the small, largely unemancipated Jewish community contributed to this perception. Jewish residents of the Papal States and of duchies under the sway of the Vatican labored under harsh restrictions. Among other things, Jews were not permitted to own land or buildings, and they were forbidden to employ Christians or enjoy friendly relations with them.

Pope Pius IX, though considering himself a great friend of Jews, resisted calls to grant them equal rights, and denounced moves by other Italian states to do so. In accordance with the doctrine of the day, he was of the view that Jews could live in Italy as guests, benefiting from the church's protection, until they saw the light and joined the true faith.

Given their fettered condition, the vast majority of Italian Jews remained mute in the face of the Mortara affair. As a result, public protests by Jews took place almost exclusively in Piedmont, which had given Jews constitutional rights in 1848. Thanks to their protests, Edgardo's plight was taken up by Jews in Britain, France and the United States.

Conditioned by centuries of anti-Semitism, Edgardo's father, a merchant, refrained from criticizing the powers-that-be. A high official, a cardinal close to the pope, had assured him that quiet diplomacy and humility would better serve his cause.

Four months after he was kidnapped, Edgardo was permitted to be reunited with his parents under strictly controlled conditions in Rome. They claimed that their son lived in constant fear of his clerical keepers, that he desperately wanted to return home and that he remained faithful to Judaism.

The Vatican, however, hotly disputed their story. Through the medium of staunchly Catholic newspapers, Edgardo was portrayed as being content with his lot. Typical of the propaganda, Kertzer writes, was a piece in Il Cattolico which reported that the pope was not only serving the boy's spiritual and educational needs but attending to his future career.

By all accounts, the pope was genuinely fond of Edgardo, whom he regarded like a son. When Cavour's emissary in Rome, Count Dominico della Minerva, conferred with the pope, he was told in no uncertain terms that Edgardo's fate was sealed.

"The Holy Father said that he was sorry about what had happened and was even more pained by the impossibility of ordering Mortara returned to his family, for to return the boy would be repugnant to his conscience," della Minerva later wrote. "He was truly persuaded that the baptism was valid and that, given this fact, he could not permit a Christian to be raised in the Jewish religion."

True to the pope's convictions, Edgardo was reared as a devout Catholic. When he was 13, Edgardo, having decided to devote his life to the church, became a novice in a Catholic order. He took the name of Pio in honor of his patron, Pope Pius IX.

Shortly afterward, the pope sent Edgardo a heart-felt message. "You are very dear to me, my little son, for I acquired you for Jesus Christ at a high price."

He was referring, of course, to the storm of indignation within Italy touched off by the kidnapping.

A bookish young man, Edgardo was inducted into the priesthood at 21. Pleased by the course of events, the pope sent him a flattering personal letter and set up a trust fund for his protege.

Father Mortara, as he came to be known, devoted his life to the church. Travelling widely throughout Europe, he was an inspirational preacher who captivated audiences by weaving his own experiences into his sermons.

In 1878, after his father's death, Edgardo met his mother in France, and it was a poignant reunion. He tried, but failed, to convert her.

Edgardo spent the next 40 years preaching to the converted, and in 1918, he moved into an abbey in Belgium, committing himself to contemplation, study, prayer and devotion to the Virgin Mary.

He died in the abbey in 1940, at a ripe old age, as German troops began rounding up Jews.

One wonders what the Nazis would have done with Edgardo, this defender of the faith, had he lived long enough to witness the long night of the Holocaust.

Secular humanism should be on CJC agenda

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD

The Ontario region council of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) probably deserves to be applauded for the resolution adopted in late June to form a council of rabbis to work for community unity. I have two reservations, however.

Guest Voices

In the absence of the text of the actual resolution, one must question the reporter's use of the words "to denounce the use of faith to create schisms" (CJN, July 2). Surely the approach should rather be to seek to counteract obstacles to Jewish intra-faith cooperation on matters of common concern. Moreover, to work towards this laudable goal, it would be desirable to establish a body that is representative of every possible Jewish denomination.

It is therefore regrettable that Sol Hermolin got little support for his suggestion to include secular representatives in the proposed new council of rabbis.

From its very inception in 1919, CJC has always included representatives of secular groups – Workmen's Circle, socialist Zionists, as well as delegates of the traditional religious denominations.

Among current national and regional secular affiliates of CJC are several who are also affiliated with the North American Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews, which is part of a world movement that has developed over the past quarter-century.

In Ontario, these groups include the UJPO Winchevsky Centre and the Thornhill-based Oraynu Secular Community. Both are members of the Congress of Secular Jewish Organizations (CSJO) which is part of the North American Federation. Similar groups are: Jews for a Humanist Secular Tradition (JHUST) in Montreal; the Sholem Aleichem Community and a senior UJPO group in Winnipeg; and the I.L. Peretz Institute in Vancouver.

In Victoria, one new group is a branch of the Society for Humanistic Judaism (SHJ). The SHJ is a founding affiliate of the North American Federation.

Several people from the Toronto area have completed a secular humanistic training program and are now serving their communities as certified leaders authorized to perform life-cycle events including weddings.

The world movement of Secular Humanistic Jews with affiliates from Russia to Australia, and including Israel, now lays claim to being a fifth Jewish denomination, after Orthodox, Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist.

So who recognizes this claim? Local communities in Canada and United States are beginning to take note.

I suggest CJC leaders should recognize secular humanism as a branch of Judaism worthy of being represented on an Intra-Faith Council for Jewish Reconciliation, which I offer as possibly a better name than another Council of Rabbis.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

"Who Is a Jew?" Conversations, Not Conclusions*, by Meryl Hyman (Jewish Lights Publishing, $23.95 (US)).

Under current law in Israel only those deemed "Jewish" by Orthodox standards may be married in the country, buried in a Jewish cemetery or granted a legal divorce. Other life affecting issues include the validity of non-Orthodox conversion, and who may immigrate to Israel as a right under its Law of Return.

At the forefront of this debate are Orthodox leaders who challenge the legitimacy of the Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist movements whose membership accounts for the overwhelming majority of Jews in North America. This rejection has given rise to deep pain, resentment and controversy. Meanwhile, the non-Jewish world looks on, partly confused, partly amused, at what appears to be a no-holds-barred civil war.

This book casts light on the entire vigorous, heated and many-sided debate. Meryl Hyman, a seasoned journalist, interviewed 25 well-known leaders from the religious, academic, and political communities in the United States, Israel and England. She presents their thoughts – in their own words – on who is "Jewish enough" to be considered a Jew, and by whom.

Can a resolution to this dilemma be found? Is compromise possible? "No," say some of those interviewed. Rabbi Nachman Bulman, mashgiach ruchni (spiritual leader) and dean of students of Orthodox Ohr Somayach Yeshiva in Jerusalem argues: "Let's first admit that the whole [Reform] program over there [the United States] is a fraud and is bankrupt. The thing is a blatant lie…We're not about to let clowns play with our Torah like little bubble games. They want us to step aside! It's outrageous! It's beyond words! The law is stronger than us. Israel will not cease to be. We can be diluted, we can be watered down, we can lose a lot of blood, we can lose six million physically and six million spiritually in almost the same generation. We will not vanish. A tenth will remain, and from that tenth everything will be rebuilt."

Rabbi Richard Hirsch is executive director of the World Union of Progressive Judaism, based in Jerusalem. He maintains that Halachah is the product of a society where Jews lived a separate and separated existence. Unfortunately, it is now impossible to adjust or change the Halachah. "Therefore, in order to keep the majority of the Jews within the fold, you have to fashion a modernized and progressive form of Judaism. If the state only recognizes one form of Judaism because of coalition politics then it becomes an instrument in the hands of the Orthodox. The result will be that you will have a total separation, a schism, between the Jews in Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora.

He states, "Never will the ultra-Orthodox accept the equality of women. Never will they permit women to serve as witnesses in a court. Never will they permit women to entertain cases of divorce. Never will they permit women to be rabbis or to get called to the Torah. A modern state can't be ruled by halachic principles."

Norman Lamm, president of Yeshiva University insists, "The battle is not over 'Who Is a Jew?' The battle is over 'Who Is a Rabbi?' That we can't yield on. I can't recognize the true rabbinic authentic credentials of a man who says, 'I do not accept the Halachah.'

"With Conservative rabbis we face a problem because some do and some don't, and some say they do and really don't, and some say they don't but really do. It's a mish-mash. So to say that I can accept a Reform rabbi as halachically authentic is to perpetuate an outright falsehood."

Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, laments: "Once upon a time normative Judaism was inspired by the impulse to bring non-Jews 'Under the wings of God's presence.' Today, in the Orthodox guise it has become a sectarian caricature obsessed with purity and power."

Listen to Sephardi tunes on line

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Over the past weeks, we have looked at the origins of Sephardi music and have listened to the many beautiful Sephardi tunes that have been incorporated into prayer. Today, something a bit different: Sephardi love songs.

According to Brigitte Sion's article The Murmur of Love and Passion: Sephardi Music, the female voice is predominant in Ladino songs or romansas, since the musical tradition was passed on from mother to daughter. The popular repertoire includes cradle songs, wedding songs and of course, love songs [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jen18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=948].

One of the most famous of those love songs is Los Bilbilicos (The Nightingales). "The nightingales sing with sighs of love. My soul and my fate are in your power. Come more quickly, dove…More quickly come beloved, Come and save me." When you hear Judy Frankel sing Los Bilbilicos [http://www.tara.com/jfr.htm], it may sound familiar since the tune is now a popular melody for Tzur Mishelo, traditionally sung on Friday nights. You can find the lyrics and sheet music to Los Bilbilicos and many other Jewish songs of all kinds at Kugel Sheet Music [http://members.aol.com/shawnkugel/kugelsheet.html]. Please note that you will need the free Adobe Acrobat Reader to view them [http://www.adobe.com/prodindex/acrobat/readstep.html].

Brazilian singer Fortuna's first exposure to Ladino was in Israel in 1991. It was love at first sight. "Although I didn't know the language at that time, I had a sensation of a deep familiarity and an immediate association with my dreams. Since that moment, my whole life changed as I recognized my own mission: to produce world music based on this music and language."

Fortuna learned Ladino and interviewed elderly Sephardi Jews in New York, Paris and São Paulo to find out more about her culture. You can sample some of her songs at her Web site [http://www.rahul.net/hrmusic/discos/fdisc.html]. Fortuna's work and life story are also included in a Web site of love songs from around the world called Putumayo World Music [http://putumayo.com/cd/romant/romant.html#fortuna].

If you want to talk about Sephardi music or Sephardi culture in general, you can join in the discussion at the Sepharade Page [http://www.sepharade.com/gstbk.html]. Also, check out both the Usenet newsgroup [alt.music.jewish] and the Jewish-Music mailing list [http://www.shamash.org/help/listoflists.html]. You can also browse through a large archive of past correspondence [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/jewish-music/].

If you want to round out your music collection with more Sephardi melodies and are comfortable buying on-line, then you'll be amazed by the selection offered by Jewishmusic.com [http://www.jewishmusic.com]. And more Sephardi sheet music is available through the Zamir Chorale of Boston [http://www.zamir.org/resources/Sepharad.html].

Finally, always remember, you don't have to be Sephardi to love Sephardi music. Judy Frankel, whose music we listened to earlier, is one of the more popular singers of Sephardi music although she herself is Ashkenazi.

"At first Sephardim were curious. Now they consider me as part of their family. Our large Jewish community in the world is like a bouquet and every smaller community is a flower. It is not a competition, it is a cornucopia."

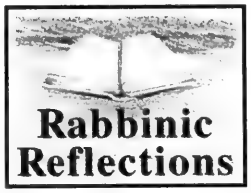
Elul's the time to build strong fences



By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

A pundit once remarked that the difference between a surgeon, an internist and a pathologist is that the surgeon does everything and knows nothing, the internist knows everything and does nothing, and the pathologist knows everything but by then it's too late.

The month of Elul is soon upon us. It begins our annual post-mortem: our intensive review of our past year's behavior. It is called the Penitential Period. And while such review is necessary for repenting of sins of the past, it is far better to use our time to consider ways of preventing sin in the future.

This thought is cleverly conveyed in a poem by Joseph Malins entitled A Fence or an Ambulance. It is a poetic rendition of a story about a city debating what to do about the dangerous cliff within its boundary. While some advocated putting a fence around the cliff, those who advocated putting an ambulance in the valley won the day. "'For the cliff is all right, if you're careful,' they said, 'And, if folks even slip and are dropping. It isn't the slipping that hurts them so much. As the shock down below when they're stopping.' So day after day, as these mishaps occurred, Quick forth would these rescuers sally/To pick up the victims who fell off the cliff. With their ambulance down in the valley."

This is how the situation remained until wisdom intervened. "Then an old sage remarked: 'It is a marvel to me/That people give far more attention/To repairing results than to stopping the cause, When they'd much better aim at prevention. Let us stop at its source all this mischief,' cried he, 'Come neighbors and friends, let us rally; If the cliffs we will fence we might almost dispense/with the ambulance down in the valley.'"

At first, this good advice went unheeded, but eventually, logic swayed those who were locked in to the error of the past. "To rescue the fallen is good, but 'tis best to prevent other people from falling."

It is easier by far to annually ask forgiveness for wrongs committed than to put into operation the appropriate mechanism to prevent them from being done. Yet, like the sensible few described by Mallins who agreed with the sage, it is far wiser to put a strong fence round the top of the cliff than an ambulance down in the valley. The month of Elul ought to be the starting point for each of us building those strong fences.

Jacobovici turns dreams into documentaries

What inspires creativity in the artist? Is creativity in the artist the inevitable expression of an accumulation of experiences? Or does creativity flow from a single, watershed experience? Ibn Ezra, the great medieval philosopher believed that the poet and the artist create by nature, not because of what they acquired through learning. This is the fourth and last article in a series of sketches on Artists & Creativity that will explore such questions.

By BILL GLADSTONE

Establishing shot: a 10th-floor boardroom over a busy intersection in downtown Toronto, with a sweeping view of many tiny cars and pedestrians moving busily along Spadina Avenue. The camera pulls back to reveal more of the boardroom, whose walls boast an assortment of prestigious trophies: several Emmy, Genie and Cable Ace awards, a Monte Carlo Silver Nymph, and a certificate of special merit from the Hollywood-based Academy of Motion Picture Arts & Sciences.

This is the home of Associated Producers, the distinguished film company whose documentary productions have included The Plague Monkeys, Deadly Currents, Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies & the American Dream and Expulsion and Memory: Descendants of Hidden Jews.

Interestingly, Simcha Jacobovici, one of the film company's founders and driving forces (his partner is Elliott Halpern) says that despite the artistic awards and acclaim, he does not regard himself as an artist. Rather, he is propelled by a flair for the pragmatic nuts-and-bolts aspects of building a company and by an innate curiosity about certain subjects. "You could say I get obsessed with an idea and I follow it up," he offers, "and I guess you could say I'm quite rigorous in my follow-up."

Born to Holocaust survivors in Israel, Jacobovici grew up in Canada under the influence of "a combination of Zionism, Judaism and the Holocaust" that has led him to become involved in Jewish causes both local and international. For instance, he headed a Jewish student organization at university, became active in efforts to assist Ethiopian and Russian Jews, and helped establish a synagogue in Toronto's Riverdale neighborhood.

"There's a sense within me that I can't sit on my hands and do nothing," says the 45-year-old filmmaker, who became an Orthodox Jew as an adult. "I have a sense of responsibility. I can't be one of the people who sit back and do nothing when other people are suffering."

Jacobovici's camera has often focused on Jewish-related subjects such as the Jews of Ethiopia, the Jews of Russia, and the Palestinian uprising (in Deadly Currents). His current project is Quest For the Lost Tribes, a two-hour documentary about the missing tribes of ancient Israel; it is being co-funded by Alliance Films, CBC and A&E television networks as a made-for-TV movie that will also have a limited theatrical release. He is simultaneously producing a book on the lost tribes for the Toronto publishing house Key-Porter.

"I see myself as a storyteller; I have a story to tell and I have to find the best way of telling it. Often it involves a combination of writing and making films. Primarily, my vehicle has been feature-length documentaries. To me, these are the most exciting form of movie-making because they're long enough that you can tell a full story and you have an opportunity to stretch the medium to use dramatic techniques."

According to Jacobovici, some documentaries have no educational content but are as much fun to watch "as a ride at an amusement park" while others "make you feel like a better person for having watched them, even though you didn't actually enjoy the experience." Associated Producers, he says, takes the middle road: "We don't see a contradiction between something that is worthy and something that is entertaining."

A proponent of "investigative cinema" of the sort that adds a newsy edge to a documentary, Jacobovici says he sometimes attains strong footage (such as a scene showing Palestinians making Molotov cocktails) of the sort that television news photographers often miss. ("The news guys were looking at us as if we were artsy-fartsy, but we got things they didn't get.")

For less risky shots, he frequently uses cranes, dollies and sophisticated lighting techniques "to give the production the kind of esthetic that one expects from a dramatic film."

That esthetic extends into the screening and editing rooms, where he tries to bring out the material's innate shape and structure. "The film is not going to be an illustrated lecture," he says. "I'm not going to write the whole thing and then slap pictures into it."

In some way, each film he makes replicates the journey he took in making it. If he feels a sense of mystery or foreboding about a place, he tries to inject that particular feeling into the finished product. A film's rough footage, he says, is "a sculptor's rock" that must be examined and carefully shaped to allow its dramatic content to emerge.

"One of the big debates on documentaries is point-of-view versus objectivity. I think it's a bogus argument. There is no objectivity. What there is, is honesty versus dishonesty, and if you're dishonest, you're a propagandist. I don't mind using anything as long as it's in the service of an honest reporting of the issue."

Besides Quest For the Lost Tribes, he is working on a film about the devastating Spanish flu epidemic of 1918 and two series, one on the roots of magic and the other on current and historical scandals, including the controversy surrounding Henry Ford after he distributed some anti-Semitic tracts. While much of Jacobovici's creative energy goes towards directing and producing films, he reserves another part for more prosaic corporate concerns.

"I'm working on building the company so we can continue making films that we're proud of," he says. "This is not a factory for making widgets. It's a vehicle for turning dreams into documentaries."

Bodyguard keeps abreast of latest security threats

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't refer to Shawn Korman as a mere bodyguard.

He's an executive protection specialist, a trained defensive driver, a martial arts practitioner, a weapons and security expert, and to boot, a nice Jewish boy – all wrapped in a non-menacing five feet ten inches and 195 pounds.

Korman is reflective of the new breed of bodyguard. In the past they may have been hulking gorillas in sunglasses, but today's executive protection specialist has to be up on the latest security threats including biological and chemical weapons, as well as stalking, and be fully conversant in every aspect of personal protection.

Shawn Korman

"People think it's glamorous but it's not," said Korman, the 31-year-old son of well-known Toronto clothier Saul Korman. "We also have to keep track of a client's medication, his appointments, his entire itinerary. We have to know first aid, etiquette, be well-groomed and be up on the latest news to make small talk."

And of course, stay alert for hours on end, watch out for suspicious types and, if necessary, act quickly.

"It's a booming industry," he says. "Billions are being spent on security and protection every year." And more and more executives are demanding personal guards. For Korman, the recent incident in which Microsoft boss Bill Gates was met with a pie in the face was no laughing matter. "If I was his close protection specialist, the guy who did it would be down [on the floor]. What if he'd been carrying a gun or a knife?"

Other CEOs have been less fortunate than Gates. They get regular threats. Some have been kidnapped. And in the entertainment industry, stalking has become a huge threat.

For Korman, the job is not the stuff of newsreels about assassinations. He takes it very seriously.

For starters, he's a black belt in the Korean martial art of Hap Ki Do and an accomplished boxer, as well as a practitioner of Krav Maga, an especially brutal form of self-defence developed in Israel for elite commandoes and high-level government protection specialists.

Korman has been in the business since 1993. Today, he runs S.A.K. Executive Protection. He has six steady clients in Canada and the United States (obviously, he can't say who) but they are high-profile entertainers and business executives. For the last three years, he has accompanied a top American CEO to the Academy Awards.

Where does one learn the volumes Korman knows about security and protection? And how does a nice Jewish boy get into this line?

Korman says he was always interested in the martial arts and studied them at the Jewish Community Centre. After graduating from Tel Aviv University with a language certificate, and from York where he studied philosophy, he dove into the security field. He graduated from Executive Security International Academy, located in the mountains of Colorado.

There, he took courses in high-tech surveillance, team protection, defensive driving, hand-to-hand combat and weaponry (featuring live fire).

Last year, he became the first Canadian to achieve certification as a VIP protection team leader from Israel's prestigious International Security School in Herzliyah. He also recently graduated from a course in chemical and biological terrorism. Korman is licensed to carry a concealed weapon in some U.S. states but not in Canada.

It's not for the faint of heart. But Korman says it's also not for the macho.

"Nine times out of 10, you're not dealing with aggression. You're advising the client or dealing with his needs," he explains. "It's not cops and robbers. The police are reactive. I'm proactive. I can read a person's intent by their eyes."

Has he ever had to get tough?

"No. I once stared down two big guys who were walking toward my client. They turned around. The whole point is to avoid getting physical. If anything happens to your client, you haven't done your job. Dead clients don't pay."

Korman charges between $35 and $95 an hour, depending on the risk. He's turned down work that was either too risky or involved unsavory types.

Sometimes even the best protection specialists fail, as in the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin and the 1981 attempt on Ronald Reagan. "It's always the little things that can mess you up," Korman says. "I watch for the little things."

UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN LAUNCH

HERE WE GO FOR FIFTY

The launch of UJA Federation's most ambitious annual fundraising drive is just around the corner. The goal – to reach a campaign total of $50 million a year by 2001.

"This is not just the start of a new campaign," says long time UJA Federation supporter Barbara Bank. "It's the beginning of a new standard in communal giving." Bank, together with David Koschitzky, are chairing the upcoming Campaign for Fifty kick-off, Monday, August 31, 8:00 p.m. at the downtown Metro Toronto Convention Centre, John Bassett Theatre, 255 Front Street West.

David Koschitzky

Barbara Bank

World renowned Israeli performers Yovel and famous Israeli comedian Tuvia Tsafir will headline the evening's entertainment which will also include an elaborate musical production and special UJA Federation video presentations.

Tickets to the event, followed by a dessert reception, which cost $18 per person in advance and $20 at the door, can be purchased by calling the UJA Federation Hotline at (416) 631-5700. Nearly 1500 community members are expected to attend.

The Campaign for Fifty, chaired by Brent Belzberg and Larry Tanenbaum, will be asking donors for increased contributions over a three year period in order to raise the annual campaign total to $50 million - $13.5 million more than last year. The additional funds will go toward new, innovative projects that strengthen Jewish identity, provide more assistance to the vulnerable and rescue Jews from danger and uncertainty throughout the world. The allocation priorities were determined after extensive consultation with UJA Federation contributors, beneficiary organizations, volunteer and professional leadership.

"There are few among us who haven't benefitted, either directly or indirectly, from the services and programs funded by UJA Federation and there's only one organization capable of providing these services," notes Koschitzky. "It's time for all of us to step up to the plate and reaffirm our commitment to our community and the future."

"The future is not a given," adds Bank. "It's up to each and every one of us to take responsibility for each other and our community."

Leventhal's Launch Mosaic

Toronto artist Ian Leventhal makes his living designing, creating and selling his works of art all over the world. You may have even caught a glimpse of one of his latest pieces hanging on the wall of your favourite Second Cup– in Toronto or even Jerusalem.

But as his donation of an original mosaic used to adorn the cover of UJA Federation's Campaign for Fifty Launch invitation and other promotional material demonstrates, Leventhal also uses his talent to help others and express his commitment to community.

"Art is the best way for me to give something back," says Leventhal who is also a husband and father of three. "I'm also very grateful for the support UJA Federation has given for Jewish art and culture to thrive in this city."

The internationally acclaimed Toronto-born sculptor and mural artist says inspiration for the piece depicting a glowing sun and vibrant stars set against the midnight sky, came from the many ancient mosaics he saw while on archeological digs in Israel.

"I wanted to illuminate hope for the future but, at the same time, anchor it in the rich Jewish traditions of the past," explains Leventhal.

Ian Leventhal

Music Moves Campaign Ahead

UJA Federation is importing some powerful Israeli talent to raise the curtain on the historic Campaign for Fifty on August 31 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, John Bassett Theatre.

The Yovel singers, who have spent the last year performing A Time to Rejoice throughout South America, Europe, Australia and South Africa, will use song and videos to lead the audience through the dramatic events leading to the establishment of the State of Israel. All six members of Yovel - Hebrew for Jubilee - served in the Israeli military in army entertainment troupes before becoming professional.

"In this show we wanted to communicate the vitality of this country and its many achievements in a very personal way," explains Canadian born creative director Allan Pakes. "So we went looking for young talented people who could express what Israel is all about."

Yovel

But singing and dancing is not all that's in store for Launch participants. Leading Israeli-born comedian and television personality Tuvia Tsafir, known for his impersonations of well-known Israeli personalities, will also take the stage. Tsafir, acclaimed for his musical portrayal of Nathan Detroit in a 1992 version of Guys and Dolls, also completed his military service as an entertainer and musician.

"There will be something for everyone," forecasts Launch co-chair Barbara Bank.

Israelis Catch The Campaign Spirit

By Adi Neuberger

After less than a year, the Jewish Agency's first national campaign to raise funds from Israelis is proving to be a huge success, according to Chairman Nicky Capelouto and Director Joe Dushansky. They recently visited Toronto to share the good news with UJA Federation and members of Toronto's Jewish community. The Jewish Agency is funded by the world-wide UJA Federation movement.

The Spirit of Israel campaign, which was officially launched last March with a mass media blitz, has, according to Capelouto, raised 15 million shekel or approximately $6 million (CDN) so far. "We generated an enthusiasm that was beyond our wildest expectations," he says.

Donations to date range from 100 shekels to $1 million U.S. and, says Capelouto, are coming from Israeli farmers, businessmen and blue collar workers. "It's a real eye opener to see who's pledging their support."

The motivation for Israelis to open their wallets is helping the Jewish Agency provide housing, food and care for an increasingly aging Israeli population. A survey conducted among 35,000 Israelis showed that a majority of the public would be willing to fund the campaign if the money went toward care for the elderly, programs for victims of abuse and increased support for supplemental education.

"Our main goal was to educate the public about the work of the Jewish Agency and why they should contribute to the campaign," explains Capelouto. "It just so happens that the Jewish Agency maintains the largest network of old age and nursing homes in the country. What better organization to give the money to?"

Dushansky and Capelouto also told UJA Federation volunteers and professionals that the campaign's early success sends a powerful message to UJA Federation campaigns around the world. "Now that Israelis are willingly taking more financial responsibility for their own welfare, the partnership between the Diaspora and Israel will be strengthened," Dushansky predicts.

Volunteer Views

For many Jewish seniors living in hospitals and nursing homes, loneliness and isolation can often be as crippling and debilitating as any medical illness. But three volunteers with the Chaplaincy Volunteer Program of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care are doing their best to make sure the residents of Baycrest Centre and Baycrest Terrace are not forgotten.

Debbie Vigoda and Ernest and Lori Gershon have worked in different fields of health care for most of their lives. But it's their shared passionate concern for the well-being of the elderly in our community and strong commitment to Jewish tradition that brought the threesome together in a harmony of healing.

For more than two years the Gershons, who own their own medical consulting and insurance business, and Vigoda, Director of the Ontario Gerentology Association, have been visiting Baycrest residents weekly, delivering their own brand of spiritual and emotional healing either one-on-one or in small groups.

"Sometimes we read to them, sometimes we pray with them from the Bible," explains Ernest. "And sometimes we just hold their hands and listen," Lori adds. "Each one of us has the need for healing at some point in our lives."

Ernest and Lori themselves were on the receiving end of chaplaincy care when they were both seriously injured in a car accident eight years ago while living in New York City. "We'll never forget the numerous phone calls we received from Rabbi Marmur and Rabbi Moscowitz from Holy Blossom Temple," recalls Ernest. "Their caring voices made a big difference to us during our recuperation," notes Lori.

Vigoda says volunteer work has become an integral part of her life, providing an opportunity to link the Jewish tradition of helping others with her specialized skills.

"Listening and just being close to the person is the most important thing I do during my visits," she says. "I think they find my voice soothing."

If you would like to find out about Chaplaincy Program volunteers at Baycrest, call Sandy Frankel at (416) 785-2500 ext. 2576. For other volunteer opportunities in the community, call Shelly Rotman at UJA Federation, (416) 635-2883 ext 137.

ATID Reunites

More than 50 members of UJA Federation's ATID second generation leadership division recently gathered at the home of Campaign for Fifty Co-Chair Lawrence Tanenbaum and his wife Judy for the first ATID event of the campaign. ATID participants were updated on the Campaign for Fifty, which will be officially launched on August 31 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre and heard from Jewish educator Dr. Elliot Malamet who spoke about the importance of developing new young leaders. ATID is co-chaired by Ken Tanenbaum and Alison Himel.

Bram Kaplan tops OAC list with 99.8 percent avererage

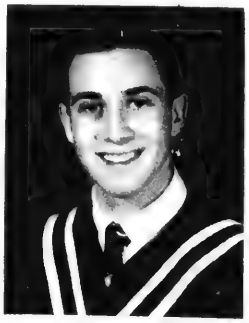
By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Go figure how Bram Kaplan can do homework in front of the television and still pull off a 99.8 percent average in his OAC year.

The top graduating student in the Greater Toronto Area and possibly in Ontario, Kaplan completed Richmond Hill High School with marks of 100 percent in Accounting, Algebra/Geometry, Calculus, Chemistry and Computers. Only his Physics mark – 99 percent – nudged his average a fraction below perfect.

Kaplan, 19, says he prefers school more for the social atmosphere than the academic aspect. He estimates he spends two to three hours a night on homework, leaving himself time to go out with friends, listen to music, ski, bike and play tennis. Earlier this summer he travelled in Europe.

But when it comes to schoolwork, he's a perfectionist. "One thing that really helps is learning from your mistakes."



Bram Kaplan

A native of Montreal who moved here at age 3 with his family, Kaplan was identified as gifted in Grade 3, and was in a gifted program from grades 7 to 12, after leaving a French immersion program.

He credits Pat Zrihen, his teacher in grades 3, 4 and 6 at Beverley Acres Public School, for teaching him discipline. "She would always challenge me. She wouldn't accept laziness or failure. I probably didn't appreciate it at the time, but looking back I'm really glad I had her as a teacher."

His parents, he says, always encouraged but never pushed him.

It was evident in elementary school that math was Kaplan's forte. He worked from higher-level textbooks than his classmates, and in Grade 6 scored higher than any of the Grade 7 students at his school when he wrote (on an unofficial basis) the Gauss contest, the Grade 7 math competition sponsored by the University of Waterloo.

Among his numerous academic awards, he recently ranked in the top three percent out of over 7,400 students who wrote the University of Waterloo's Descartes Mathematics Competition.

This fall Kaplan, who plans a career as an actuary, will begin the Honors Mathematics program at the University of Waterloo on a $9,000 scholarship. Although he'd considered a $13,000 scholarship offered by the University of Toronto, once he decided to opt for the math co-op program (which U of T doesn't offer), his choice became "obvious."

So what would he tell other students who aspire to marks like his? "You've got to work hard at it. Be persistent. Seek help when you're not sure how to do something – don't let it go by."

Kaplan also finds it helps him to help others students with their work. "When they ask me questions and I give them the answers, it means I understand it myself."

And about doing homework in front of the television – he only did that sometimes.

Family Quest mission set

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), is initiating a 12-day small communities' family educational institute in Israel called Family Quest.

The inaugural program is scheduled from Dec. 21, 1998 to Jan. 4, 1999 and is open to any Canadian Jewish family living in a small community.

Family Quest is operated in partnership with the Canada Israel Experience Centre. CJC staff and Jewish Agency personnel will try to expose families to different programs and concepts than can be implemented in their own communities, said Michael Soberman, director of community services and youth activities.

Some of the program highlights will be attendance at the Israel Experience opening ceremonies at Ceasarea; group ceremonies at Yad Vashem and Har Herzl; Shabbat at the Kotel in Jerusalem; and visits to Tel Aviv, Safed, Canada Centre in Metulla and northern Israel, Massada and the Dead Sea.

Cost of the trip is $2,499 for adults, $2,350 for the first child (under 12) and $2,250 for each additional child. Shabbat in Nairobi was anything but normal

By BARRY PAKES
Special to The CJN

We barely had a minyan Friday night. This was not normal for the small but committed Nairobi Jewish community, but this was not a normal Friday night.

SPECIAL REPORT

Many shul-goers were still helping out at the hospitals, while others were too afraid to leave their homes. The sanctuary was buzzing with the gory descriptions given by those of us who had witnessed the explosion or its aftermath. Just looking at the flattened buildings and shattered windows up to one kilometre away, you could understand why there were 4,000 injured and some 250 dead.

The man with the British accent who was going to lead services commented that he was the architect of three of the four buildings severely damaged in Dar-es-Salaam and Nairobi.

Many of the shul members, whose ancestors were British settlers in the last century, described the devastation wreaked on their businesses and how they each escaped death.

I in turn explained that I am a Canadian medical student doing research in East Africa, and I accidentally took the wrong bus from Chagoria Hospital on Mount Kenya and was, luckily, hours late when I finally arrived at the smoldering remains of the Nairobi business district.

We got a minyan and decided to begin, although the leader of the community, who is the chief of medicine at the Nairobi hospital, was still absent.

At dinner, we joined all Kenyans in trying to understand what had happened, but before night's end many ordinary Kenyans had already come to their own conclusions. "If I see an Arab now, I will slaughter him like a goat," I overheard a man telling his friend in Swahili on my walk home.

On Shabbat morning, we received word that 200 Israelis were coming to stay with us at the Nairobi Synagogue complex. After quickly davening and eating, we spent the hours before the Israelis arrived walking between the Kenyatta and Nairobi hospitals to do all we could to help and to donate blood.

My white skin and my kippah made it easy for me to approach the now heavily guarded explosion site. I stared for about two hours at the huge co-op building whose glass face had come crashing down on a line of people waiting for visas. Hundreds of Kenyan soldiers lazed about, throwing garbage all over the crime scene. There was no organization and with each passing moment, evidence was being destroyed and the hope of finding survivors was dwindling.

Finally the Israelis arrived, donned their yellow hats and began to direct the operation. The Kenyans were overjoyed. "The Israelis are perfect" they exclaimed. "You remember we refueled them from Entebbe," another mentioned. "The Americans are only wanting to help their people, but the Israelis are trying to help Kenyans."

Meanwhile, at the synagogue, the medical team had already made themselves at home, shedding their uniforms for T-shirts and jelly slippers. The synagogue was turned into a reserve army base in about an hour. Hundreds of green dufflebags, cases of bottled water and 40 cases of field rations were piled in the hallway. The Israelis worked in shifts through the night.

I would never have thought at Friday night services that we would end up having 200 additional guests on Saturday for seudah shlishit. One normally thinks of Israel absorbing Diaspora communities. This time it was a Diaspora community temporarily absorbing Israelis.

It will not be talked about in the news, but Jews the world over must remember how Diaspora communities, even small ones, can help change the political reality for Israel. The presence of the Nairobi Synagogue and a Jewish community with good relations with the local government, enabled the Israeli operation to proceed with ease.

The Israelis are gone now, but they will be remembered fondly in Kenya, improving the relationship between Israel and non-aligned Africa.

Throughout East Africa my kippah was greeted with warm shaloms from Ethiopians and Kenyans who knew of the courageous and strong State of Israel, as well as caring committed Jewish aid-workers from the Diaspora.

Barry Pakes is a third year medical student at UofT who spent three months doing medical research in Ethiopia and Kenya, and is currently studying in a yeshiva in Jerusalem.

Controversial thesis approved

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Laval University (LU) recently approved a controversial Master's thesis that was seen by some – including one of the paper's own examiners – as an apologia for the Nazi regime, raising questions about the university's evaluation process.

The 245-page paper, by political science graduate student Pierre Asselin, presents the main thesis that Quebec nationalist icon Lionel Groux based his ardent defence of the Quebec "race" in a "corporatist" philosophy – an alternative to liberalism and socialism emerging out of a conservative nationalism running through Europe – including Nazi Germany – during the 20th century.

Asselin, however, while praised even by critics for his thoroughness and research skills, aroused concern over other aspects to his thesis, which seemed to validate behavior by the Nazi regime.

Needless to say, Asselin's thesis sparked a debate both within the academic community and from outside critics over issues of academic freedom and how graduate papers are assessed.

Last week, Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), sent a letter to LU rector François Tavenas complaining about the thesis.

MC keeps tax exempt status

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maccabi Canada (MC) officials heaved a huge sigh of relief recently when the Federal Court of Appeal in Ottawa rejected a bid by Revenue Canada to revoke MC's tax-exempt status as a registered Canadian amateur athletic association (RCAAA).

"This nightmare is now behind them," said Montreal lawyer Barbara Novek, a partner in the firm of Sweibel, Novek, who with lawyer Arthur Drache of Ottawa led MC's four-year fight to keep its status.

If the court had upheld Revenue Canada's decision, it would have almost certainly spelled an end to the 23-year-old organization.

Why did Canada's tax department go after MC in the first place?

Because, the revenue ministry argued that according to its revised interpretation of subsection 248(1) of the Income Tax Act, MC did not carry on its activities on a "nation-wide basis" – not in the geographic sense, but in a demographic one – in order to qualify as a tax-exempt RCAAA.

According to the revenue ministry's reading of "nation-wide," MC not only had to be active across Canada – which it is – but provide, "a public benefit to Canadians in general."

In other words, not just cater to members of the Jewish community.

Justice Gilles Létourneau, however, representing the unanimous view of the Court of Appeal's three justices, rejected this argument out-of-hand in a June 30 "judgment from the bench," a ruling that came down after only a few hours of deliberation the same day arguments were put forward.

"In our view, these words [nation-wide] describe a geographic requirement only," the Court said.

"It is sufficient that a Canadian amateur athletic association applying for registration under the Act carries on activities across Canada and not be provincially, regionally or locally limited.

"This interpretation is consistent with the legislative intent to ensure that the issuing of receipts to donators (sic) would come from a single organization at the national level and Revenue Canada would not have to interface with a myriad of provincial, regional and local organizations."

Ironically, MC's troubles, Novek said, date back at least five years, when due to sheer oversight, the organization failed to file an "information" tax return.

Although that situation was remedied quickly, the revenue department began to review MC's original application for RCAAA status and to re-assess its definition of "nation-wide." It then began the process of revoking Maccabi Canada's RCAAA status.

Revenue Canada argued in court that no national amateur sports group that excludes based on race, religion or ethnicity should enjoy tax benefits.

Novek and Drache responded that while only Jewish athletes tend to affiliate with Maccabi Canada, no where in its charter does it specifically restrict affiliation to Jews.

The Court said, essentially, that Revenue Canada's point about exclusion based on race, religion or ethnicity was besides the point.

"Counsel may be right," the Court said, "in his contention that a Canadian amateur athletic association who advocates and applies exclusionary or discriminatory practices should not be granted a registration so as to enjoy tax benefits."

The Court ruled that, "The Respondent [the Minister of National Revenue] has not been able to point to any reference in the [Income Tax] Act which would justify giving [the words 'nation-wide'] a different and more encompassing meaning like the one sought."

Within Maccabi Canada, she said, "people were certainly very, very happy" by the Court of Appeal's ruling.

How will Swiss funds be disbursed?

"We don't want a repeat of the claims conference," he said, referring to the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, an unwieldy agency headquartered in New York.

In June, Jewish groups rejected as inadequate an offer by Swiss banks to pay $600 million to settle all claims.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) says there are about 100 Holocaust survivors in Canada who have claims against Swiss banks, most of them living in the Toronto area.

CJC and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) both welcomed the settlement. Congress called it "just," while BBC said it was "pleased" with the deal.

Jack Silverstone, CJC's national executive director, said the settlement is separate from the $170-million (US) humanitarian fund set up last year by Swiss banks for the benefit of Holocaust survivors, specifically the needy.

Roughly $2 million was allocated to Canada, where an estimated one-third of all Jewish poor are over age 65.

A committee of Congress members, Holocaust survivors and lawyers will be struck to handle claims and disburse funds. Silverstone said the money should be distributed in the coming months, either directly to needy survivors or to communal social welfare programs.

As for last week's settlement, "we don't know how it will affect Canada yet. We hope to settle direct claims first" and distribute the remainder for humanitarian reasons, Silverstone said.

"We know people have been waiting for five decades, but they have to be a bit more patient," Silverstone added. "At this stage of the game, the best thing for people to do is to wait a little longer and see how the terms and conditions of the deal are going to play out in the coming weeks and months."

But according to CJC president Moshe Ronen, a committee made up of lawyers and community leaders "may very well be implemented" to distribute funds arising from the settlement "quickly and locally."

That has Karas seeing red: "CJC has no business attempting to determine who is entitled to compensation and who isn't. That's wrong and un-Jewish."

In the meantime, the settlement has to be approved by the federal judge in New York who considered whether to hear the $20-billion class-action lawsuit against the Swiss banks brought by 35,000 plaintiffs worldwide.

However, that's expected to be a formality, and the first payment of $250 million (US) will be made 90 days after the judge grants his approval.

Subsequent payments will be made on the second, third and fourth anniversaries of his approval.

The judge and the plaintiffs' lawyers will develop a plan to determine how the money will reach claimants. Karas said he and an American colleague will be there "to make sure [Canadian] clients are not short-changed."

However, "it remains to be seen who is entitled to what. We're very concerned. We would like to know who is entitled to recovery from the settlement."

A large portion of the settlement will be used to satisfy claims filed with the Swiss ombudsman by survivors or their heirs seeking the return of dormant bank accounts.

Roughly 6,000 claims from around the world are still being probed by a panel led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chair Paul Volcker.

Among the claimants to a dormant account is Toronto contractor Edward Leibi, 70. His uncle, who had been a currency trader before the war, was on his death bed at a concentration camp when he tried to tell Leibi something before dying.

Leibi suspects it was about the existence of money stashed in a Swiss bank.

Leibi, himself a survivor of nine different camps, calls the settlement "nothing...a drop in the bucket compared to what the Swiss did. They prolonged the war by collaborating with the Nazis."

CJC, ARJSH meet with Romanian ambassador

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and members of the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust (ARJSH) recently met with Romania's ambassador to Canada to discuss Holocaust-related activities in that country.

"Following our successful meeting with representatives of the Department of Foreign Affairs in June, we believed it essential to communicate our concerns to the new Romanian ambassador. We were delighted with the warm and cordial reception given us by Ambassador [Gabriel] Gafita and his willingness to support our advocacy," said ARJSH president Issie Veisfeld.

The delegation discussed several priorities presented in a brief to Romanian President Emil Constantinescu in Montreal earlier this year.

Foremost among these is the need for increased education, particularly among Romanian youth. "Educational reform is primarily aimed at teaching young Romanians the truth, but it may also help diminish attempts at Holocaust denial by certain members of the wartime generation living in Canada," said CJC Ottawa office director Eric Vernon."

Also discussed was the possibility of having memorials listing names of the dead placed at the sites of mass graves in Romania where Jews were buried during the war.

At the same time, the delegation once again protested the campaign to memorialize wartime leader, general Ion Antonescu as a hero and patriot.

"It is a bizarre contradiction to educate young Romanians about what happened to the Jews in Romania during the World War II, while others are working to rehabilitate the reputation of Antonescu," said ARJSH honorary vice-president Lou Zablow.

Another issue related to the restitution of property seized before and during the war, both communal and private. "The Romanian government of the day evicted us from our homes and businesses and expropriated our land and property," Veisfeld said. "We look to the Romanian government of today, which seeks to maintain its standing among the civilized nations of the world, to make right what its predecessors did to us over 50 years ago."

Gafita said he would discuss the issues with the appropriate officials in Bucharest. In particular, he indicated a willingness to assist in several property restitution cases, based on a list of names and documents to be provided by Veisfeld. He noted that several Jewish communal properties have already been returned to the community and that Romania's prime minister recently announced that others are being processed for return.

Romanian survivors who had property confiscated between 1940 and 1945 are asked to contact ARJSH if they wish to be included on the list. Phone 514-676-0687 or fax 514-656-5572.

CFRB's Adler returns to Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

He will be replacing Peter Warren, the longtime host of CJOB's daily morning show, who is retiring after 28 years. CJOB is Winnipeg's most listened to station and Warren's show has the most listeners.

"I was flattered to be offered the job," Adler says. "Peter Warren was my inspiration."

Adler first came to Winnipeg in 1983 as news director of a rival radio station. He left in 1990 to host an open-line show in Calgary. He also spent a few years in the United States hosting open-line shows before signing on with CFRB two years ago.

Although he arrives in Winnipeg on Sept. 1, he will not be taking up his new position until November. "I need time to get reacquainted with the city and find out what is going on," he says. "It wouldn't be a smart thing to go on the air cold."

He promises that his show will not be a clone of the Peter Warren show. He is considering making it a little more entertainment-oriented and perhaps introducing some background music.

When Adler last lived in Winnipeg, he was involved in the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and used the YMHA. He looks forward to joining the Rady Jewish Community Centre at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Vancouver Sephardic congregation to get new shul

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver's Congregation Beth Hamidrash, the only Sephardic congregation in Canada west of Toronto, will soon be getting a new home.

Construction of a new synagogue on the site of the present shul is slated to begin at the end of the year.

Rabbi Yosef Benarroch, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Hamidrash, called the new synagogue "a dream come true.

"Our community really deserves the new facility," Rabbi Benarroch said. "It will be a comfortable building from every aspect, and it will make everything we do here more comfortable."

Beth Hamidrash has a membership of approximately 150 families. The present synagogue is 2,600 square feet in area. The new structure will be 7,400 sq. ft.

Synagogue president Tony DuMoulin told The CJN that the congregation decided to build a new synagogue because the present building is old and in need of serious repairs. "The building was constructed some time in the 1950s, if not earlier, and the last time it was renovated was 1977," DuMoulin said.

The new building is expected to take 11 months to complete said architect Michael Katz who is in charge of the project.

Total cost of construction is approximately $1 million, DuMoulin said.

Thanks to a large donation from two Vancouver businesspeople, the congregation is part way towards raising the necessary funds. "Beth Hamidrash received a very generous gift of $100,000 from Morris Wosk, and Victor Setton, who is a member of the congregation, has agreed to match contributions to the building fund," DuMoulin noted.

Katz said the new two-storey synagogue will be extended 20 feet back. On the main floor will be the synagogue entrance, offices and the sanctuary. Upstairs will house the women's gallery and classrooms. The kitchen, dining room and teens room will be in the basement.

Katz said the synagogue's sanctuary will increase in size only marginally. "Most of increased space will accommodate facilities that we don't have in the present building," he said.

"[The synagogue] is going to be in the same place it's been in for years, so people aren't going to have to move," said Katz. "That's extremely important."

He said the new building will retain the feeling of the present synagogue. "It's going to be modest and cozy and extremely beautiful inside," Katz explained. "There will be maple trim, large skylights and Sephardic arches. The bimah will be centralized.

The entrance will be from the west – the back of the building – rather than from the front, as it is now, so that people will not be disturbed during the service."

The back lane behind the synagogue will be paved in brick. The Heather Street facade – the front of the building – will be redone in Jerusalem stone to improve the streetscape.

There will be stained glass windows on the Heather Street facade, and Mogen David-shaped windows on the doors.

Arafat rejects further 'useless' talks with Israel

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat said last Sunday he cancelled a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's envoy, Yitzhak Molcho, to stress he is no longer interested in what he called useless talks with Israel.

Arafat told MK Dedi Zucker and other Meretz MKs in Ramallah Sunday that he cancelled the meeting Israel had requested with Molcho on Saturday night to demonstrate his lack of trust in the Netanyahu government.

"Arafat doesn't see virtually any chance for progress," Zucker said. "He doesn't know how long he can control the Palestinian street."

Labor MK Ofer Pines said Arafat also warned that unless the peace process advances significantly, Arafat will proceed with plans to declare an independent state next May.

"His message was very clear," Pines said. "He said the peace process is in a deep freeze. He is very concerned over his loss of control over his own people. I asked 'Do we have to wait for a new intifadah?' He didn't respond directly, but he made it understood that anything could happen."

According to Pines, Arafat said if there is no progress on the interim arrangements and diplomatic process, he would have no option but to declare a state next year. Arafat also said a Palestinian state would be established at the end of the negotiations on the final-status arrangements.

Ahmed Tibi, Arafat's adviser on Israeli affairs, said the opposition MKs had asked for the meeting for an update on recent negotiations.

Netanyahu told reporters Sunday he is interested in continuing the peace process and said contacts would probably resume this week, although he was scheduled to start a week's vacation in the north last Monday.

"Certainly there is goodwill on our side to try to move the process forward...If the Palestinians show equal goodwill, I'm confident we can move the process forward and indeed bring it to rapid conclusion," Netanyahu said after Sunday's cabinet meeting.

General Security Service chief Ami Ayalon reportedly told the cabinet the Palestinians are not interested in a terror attack at present, but that Arafat erred in not condemning the murders of two settlers at Yitzhar two weeks ago. While noting Arafat had condemned past attacks, Ayalon said Arafat is not concerned about possible fallout from the attack at Yitzhar.

Arafat, who met with Norwegian envoy Terje Larsen in Ramallah last week, again called on Albright to release the U.S. bridging proposals that call for a 13 percent Israeli handover of the West Bank to the Palestinians.

Palestinian police put curfew on Jericho

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian police clamped a curfew on Jericho, and searched house-to-house Sunday for escaped prisoner Imad Awadallah, a senior Hamas militant accused of killing bombmaker Muhi Sharif.

Roadblocks were set up in Jericho and in Ramallah, where Awadallah's family lives, and police searched cars and orchards in Jericho. Police vans drove through the town Sunday afternoon, with officers ordering merchants and residents to return home.

It was the first time the Palestinian Authority (PA) imposed a curfew on its own people, although it was in effect only in the centre of town and not strictly enforced. Still, locals accustomed to such curfews during years of Israeli control, rushed to stock up at bakeries before going home.

Israeli soldiers joined in the hunt, setting up roadblocks on Israeli-controlled roads leading out of Jericho and elsewhere in the West Bank.

Israel Radio reported that Palestinian police had arrested 15 Hamas activists in connection with Awadallah's escape.

PA security sources said Awadallah escaped from his Jericho prison cell at about 7 p.m. on Saturday. However, Hamas sources said they fear the 29-year-old Awadallah was killed by the PA in jail and the authorities fabricated the escape story to explain his disappearance. This concern was also voiced by Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Awadallah is the brother of Adel Awadallah, who is suspected of planning the Jerusalem bus bombings in early 1996 and is still at large.

PA Chairman Yasser Arafat has ordered an inquiry into the escape, to be headed by PA West Bank police chief Brig.-Gen. Haj Ismail Jabber.

"From the minute that Awadallah was reported missing, an inquiry was launched," Jabber told reporters. "We don't have any knowledge [of how he escaped]."

PA security sources asserted that Awadallah was not being mistreated. They also said they suspect he escaped in a car with Israeli licence plates.

PA security officials Sunday searched Awadallah's home in El Bireh. At the same time, IDF troops searched in Area B, which is under Israeli security control.

Awadallah is accused of killing Sharif in March in a feud within the Islamic movement over money and power. PA officials said Awadallah shot Sharif to death and then arranged for his bomb workshop to be blown up – as if he had died in an accidental explosion.

Hamas leaders say Sharif was killed by either Palestinian or Israeli agents.

"The Palestinians themselves say it was an inside job," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told reporters concerning Awadallah's escape. "But we have no information as to who helped and in what capacity or at what level, so we are still investigating this as well."

Palestinian security chief Jibril Rajoub said recently that Awadallah had confessed to Sharif's killing and would be tried.

Israel joins nuclear arms talks

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel has agreed to join global negotiations aimed at banning the production of materials used to make nuclear weapons.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had been urged by President Bill Clinton not to oppose the efforts of a UN panel in Geneva to launch the negotiations.

The prime minister said in a statement that while he would not oppose the talks, Israel still had "problems of principle" with any accord that would halt the production of plutonium and enriched uranium.

Israel was the last of the 61-member United Nations Conference on Disarmament to agree to the negotiations.

"We have made clear that our support for establishing the [negotiating] committee does not mean we are taking a position toward finalizing the treaty or its contents," Netanyahu said in the statement.

Israel is concerned the treaty will call for verification procedures requiring it to open its Dimona nuclear facility in the Negev to international inspectors.

IDF rescue team gets hero's welcome back home

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The IDF's Home Front Command rescue team received a warm welcome on its return to Israel from Nairobi last Thursday night.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, U.S. Ambassador Edward Walker and a senior official of the Kenyan Embassy were at Lod Air Force Base to receive them.

Netanyahu praised the members of the rescue team for their sterling efforts in saving lives and for the "great honor" they had brought to Israel and the IDF.

He said their mission in Nairobi was " in my eyes, one of the basic foundations of the IDF – to help the victims and the weak in times of distress."

Netanyahu said the rescuers had also helped in the "difficult and determined" war against world terrorism.

"It was not just our war, or that of the U.S., Kenya or Tanzania, but that of the whole democratic world," said Netanyahu

The 170 members of the rescue team, including reservists, regular soldiers, doctors and paramedics from the medical corps, as well as seven dogs specially trained to locate people under debris, arrived in Nairobi and started their work just 23 hours after being given the order to go.

The team, using specialized equipment and knowledge acquired over the years, rescued three survivors and recovered 96 bodies from the debris of the buildings destroyed in the car bomb blast in the Kenyan capital.

Kenyan President Daniel Arap Moi met with the rescue team for a courtesy call before they returned to Israel.

Moi expressed deep appreciation for their work and asked that this be conveyed to Netanyahu and the country.

"The Kenyan people and I are full of appreciation to the IDF and Israel," he said.

He said the mutual relations between the two countries, which have always been special, will be even better now and will be expressed in broadening cooperation with Israel in new fields.

When they stepped from the IAF 707 that brought them back to Israel, the members of the rescue unit held their heads high, despite their tiredness.

The feeling of pride at their achievements was tinged with sadness, especially because they did not manage to save the life of the Kenyan woman they knew as Rose.

"We saw some terrible things, but we also had the satisfaction of knowing that we had done our job and done it well," said dog handler Shlomo Rosen, 43, of Ramat Hasharon.

"I was in Buenos Aires in 1994 with another dog who later died. Since then, I trained this one," said Rosen, stroking the head of his dog Max, a 4-year-old Rotweiler.

"Max found three people under the rubble and signaled the rescuers by barking over the spots. One of them was rescued alive, but unfortunately the two others were dead when they were brought out."

'We saw some terrible things'

The dog had also helped in the search for Rose. "When we found Rose and discovered that she was dead, it was a great disappointment," Rosen said.

"What really disappointed us was that she had died about 20 hours before we reached her. If we had been able to locate her precisely beforehand we would have been able to save her. Even so, we managed to remove her body intact," she said.

Hallawi, who was specially trained as a rescue officer, was confronted for the first time with a real situation and dead bodies, instead of the dolls used in exercises.

"I wasn't really shocked. I just went in there and started working and doing my job as I had been trained to do," Hallawi said.

"Of course, when I saw the first body, it was kind of a shock, but I did not allow myself to have any feelings. I pulled out the body, covered it up and then helped my team to carry the woman out," Hallawi said.

Mofaz tries to instil fighting spirit into Israeli troops

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz wants to sweep out what he sees as years of accumulated mediocrity on the part of the IDF in southern Lebanon.

"We need to stress the value of victory. The combat units in the IDF need to know that victory is a necessary virtue and that no compromises will be tolerated when it comes to contact with the enemy," Mofaz said last week.

He was speaking in the aftermath of the daylight infiltration last week of the Soujud outpost in the security zone by a Hezbollah gunman who then escaped alive. He called the incident a "serious operational failure."

Mofaz, following his own summary inquiry into what has become known as the "Soujud fiasco," ordered that disciplinary action be taken against the paratroopers involved – an officer and two soldiers .

He ordered the platoon commander dismissed, and ordered that the two soldiers should no longer serve as combat troops in the paratroop company.

He also instructed that reprimands be noted in the records of the head of the IDF's Lebanese Liaison Unit, the regional brigade commander and the battalion commander.

Mofaz determined that there had been flaws in preparing the paratroop unit for its mission in the area and the senior officers had not been sufficiently involved.

Mofaz conducted his own inquiry after receiving the report of Northern Command's investigation into the incident.

The IDF spokesperson said that all details of the incident were examined in depth. These included how the Hezbollah gunman infiltrated the outpost and stayed for several seconds in one of the perimeter positions.

During that period, the gunman fired at one of the soldiers, grappled with another, then managed to flee, leaving behind his rifle and other equipment.

Mofaz was clearly disgusted with two facts about last week's fiasco: that a Hezbollah guerrilla was able to penetrate an IDF position, and that he was able to escape.

It was not the first such dismal encounter between Israeli and Hezbollah gunmen since Mofaz took over July 9. On July 30, Hezbollah guerrillas ambushed an IDF patrol, killing one soldier and cutting down five others who barely returned fire. The Shi'ite gunmen escaped without casualties.

Mediocrity is no virtue, Mofaz believes. Furthermore, in his eyes, intellect, learning, and skill are not enough.

By dismissing several young officers and banishing some paratroopers from the brigade, Mofaz was sending a message to the troops in Lebanon and elsewhere. By censuring the senior commanders, he was sending them a message too.

Still, cynics say, the behavior of the paratroopers and other troops in Lebanon is to be expected, given the mixed messages soldiers hear back home and the way they are trained on base.

Silence is golden in intelligence operations

By MOSHE ZAK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

The military mission that flew the IDF's rescue team to Nairobi was not the first to travel this route.

They were preceded by the aircraft that had stopped in Nairobi en route home from the heroic Entebbe hostage rescue in Uganda in July 1976.

At that time, Gen. Brent Scowcroft, the president's national security adviser, came to the Israeli Embassy in Washington and asked the meaning of the Israeli air traffic in east Africa spotted by American monitoring stations. Only when the rescuers were on their way home, however, was the secret of that mission divulged to the Americans.

This time, over 20 years later, the rescue operation in Nairobi was fully coordinated with the American defence secretary. This is not just because the terror blast was at the American Embassy, but also because today there is cooperation and strategic planning between Israel and the United States.

The IDF and U.S. medical corps, in their joint manoeuvres, had already established procedures for cooperation in the event of major terror attacks. It should therefore be no surprise that the hundreds of Israeli rescue workers who left for Nairobi after the attack knew immediately what to do.

This kind of cooperation was initiated following the October 1983 explosion at the U.S. Marines base in Lebanon. Israel offered to hospitalize the wounded at Rambam Hospital in Haifa, close to the location of the attack. But the American defence secretary rejected the offer, preferring to hospitalize the soldiers in Germany.

Opinion

He was severely criticized for this move in the U.S. Senate. The result was joint manoeuvres, which determined that Rambam would be used by U.S. forces in case of an emergency in the region.

Since then, the United States has not avoided or denied cooperating with Israel in the fight against terror.

Recently, however, a change was instituted that may be a cause for concern in the future. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu publicly approached the United States with a proposal to cooperate in the investigation to find the Muslim terrorists who attacked the U.S. embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam.

Cooperation with the Americans is possible and may even be necessary to track down the monstrous car bombers. But intelligence operations are, by their very nature, most successful when they remain discreet. They do not respond favorably to publicity.

On the eve of the Gulf War, when the United States concentrated immense forces in the region to force Saddam Hussein to withdraw from Kuwait, the Iraqi government suggested that it would be willing to withdraw from Kuwait if, in return, the United States gave assurances that it would settle the Israel-Palestinian conflict. The Russian foreign minister offered to mediate to help achieve this.

The United States, however, turned the deal down outright, as it would have enhanced Iraq's status in the Arab world.

It is quite possible that the sense of panic in the face of possible terrorist attacks of the same kind as those in Kenya and Tanzania will lead to similar ideas about concessions at Israel's expense.

It is therefore preferable, at this stage, to let sleeping dogs lie. Overemphasizing the cooperation between Israeli and U.S. intelligence may trigger a counterreaction from Americans who have not been reconciled to cooperating with Israel, and might push the administration to act against Israel to appease Muslim terrorists, in the hope that they will end their attacks against the United States.

There are, in fact, governments in Europe who have bought "quiet" in their countries from Palestinian terrorists by turning their backs on Israel. Last week's terrorist bombers may well be hoping that, in the end, the American public will become fed up with the violence and will consider doing the same thing.

Judging by the current state of affairs, the Bill Clinton administration is not likely to give in to the blackmail of Muslim terror organizations. At the moment, the administration is determined to fight terror, to find the perpetrators and even to retaliate.

But if Israel insists on publicly demanding that its intelligence people participate in investigating the crimes at Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, it may well divert attention away from the key objective and towards a debate on how the United States can best free itself of terrorist pressure.

At that point, "moderate" Arab states may attempt to lobby the administration to limit and restrict American support for Israel, to curry favor with Muslim terrorists.

Success in the war against terror depends first and foremost on a clear message being sent to the Islamic terror organizations: There will be no submission to car bombs, not even at Israel's expense.

Dear Gloria,

It has been a pleasure working with you Gloria for the past several years. Over that period of time, the Canadian Jewish News has proven to be a very effective advertising medium for addressing the Jewish Community and I have seen the 4th page of the CJN become a very effective 'home' for my company's ads. Initially, I chose the CJN because as a Jewish professional, I felt my company should patronize its own community's institutions. For several years now, I have come to appreciate the professional and consistent manner in which the Canadian Jewish News runs its newspaper and the fact that it delivers a very intelligent and upwardly mobile market.

My company intends to continue its relationship with the Canadian Jewish News for many years to come and looks forward to our mutual continued growth.

Sincerely,

Israel, Jordan take steps to boost trade

By NINA GILBERT
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel agreed last week to a number of concessions sought by Jordan aimed at boosting bilateral trade and relations.

In talks in Jerusalem between Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky and his Jordanian counterpart, Hani Mulki, the sides agreed to reduce the Israeli input requirement for joint ventures in Qualified Industrial Zones in Jordan from 11.7 percent to 7 percent for high-tech products and 8 percent for other products in order to qualify for free trade status for export to the United States. The change, meant to jump-start joint industry in the zone, would be in effect for one year.

The sides also agreed to ask the United States to recognize more zones for free-trade status, the first two being Mafrak, in northern Jordan, and the Jordan Gateway Project, on the border with Israel in the Jordan Valley.

Sharansky invited Mulki to travel with him to Brussels in order to advance European Union recognition of jointly produced products for free trade status.

The two also held talks with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the peace process and economic relations.

Mulki was quoted as saying Jordan is suffering a loss of business with certain Arab countries such as Syria, due to its ties with Israel, and this should therefore be compensated via an increase in business with Israel.

"The best way to advance trade is through joint ventures," Sharansky said. "Jordanians are asking what are the fruits of peace in practical and economic terms. It is extremely important to make special efforts to advance relations in the region."

Mulki said that Jordan and Israel should aim not only to boost exports, but also imports from each other, "because whatever you get from somewhere else will be more expensive to your economy."

At Jordan's request, Netanyahu promised to advance efforts for cooperation in the use of Akaba Airport, where only a few Israeli flights land at unprofitable hours, and to move the venture beyond the experimental stage.

Netanyahu also agreed in principle to Israel's approval of 75 percent of a list of 2,000 products Jordan wants to include on the A-1 list for export on easier terms to the Palestinian Authority, which will now have to negotiate terms on the products with Jordan.

Mulki also informed Sharansky that the possibility of a joint Israeli venture with Jordan Bromide is no longer an option. An American company will likely become the partner instead.

Sharansky hosted Mulki for a dinner with the country's top businesspeople and trade officials, who toasted King Hussein's speedy recovery.

Among those who attended were former Koor CEO Benny Gaon, who will next week assume the position of the head of the Israel-Jordan Chamber of Commerce.

The general manager of Motorola Israel, Elisha Yanai, said the company's factory in Irbid would start operating in September. A group of Jordanians just finished training at the company's Arad facility, which will be relocated to Jordan, he said.

He said Israeli high-tech companies should produce in Irbid instead of in places such as the Far East, because it makes good business sense.

Shuls in Germany rebuilt on Internet

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON – Synagogues that were destroyed by the Nazis are being rebuilt by German architecture students – on the Internet.

The recreation of up to 15 synagogues is the brainchild of Marc Grellert, a lecturer at Darmstadt Technical University, who launched the project after an arson attack on one of Germany's remaining synagogues in Lubeck in 1994.

"I wanted to do something to remind people that Jews were very much a part of German society before the Nazis," he said.

A pilot project has led to the "virtual construction" of three synagogues in Frankfurt using computer-aided design.

The German Education Ministry has provided a grant of more than $50,000 (US) for these three "synagogues" to be recreated by students as part of their course work in the upcoming academic year.

The city of Nuremberg has agreed to pay for one of its old synagogues to be revived on computer, while Dortmund and other German cities are considering following suit.

Grellert hopes that enough money will be pledged to finance the 15 "virtual synagogues."

He said he does not want Jewish groups to contribute. Non-Jewish Germans should pay for the "virtual reconstruction" of synagogues destroyed by the Nazis, he said.

"Hopefully the project will remind people that synagogues were once part of the skyline in nearly every major German city," he said.

Synagogues slated for "reconstruction" have been chosen for their distinctive architectural styles – for example, a moorish shul in Cologne, a Bauhaus synagogue in Plauen and the Germanic, neo-Romanesque style of a synagogue in Hanover.

Jordan aiming to pacify Syria

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

LONDON — Jordan's diplomatic overtures to Iran have been aimed at easing tensions with Syria, analysts in London said.

They believe this was the motive for last week's hastily arranged visit to Tehran by Jordanian Deputy Prime Minister Jawad Anani.

The visit's stated purpose was to deliver a letter to President Mohammed Khatami on "means of strengthening relations and cooperation" between the two countries.

Iranian-Jordanian relations have been tense since the start of the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war, when Jordan supported Iraq. The two states also differ over the peace process and Iran's territorial dispute with the United Arab Emirates.

London-based Arabic-language daily, Al-Quds al-Arabi, said in a news analysis that Jordanian foreign policy-makers believe an improved rapport with Iran will serve to contain "serious tensions" between Jordan and Syria.

Britain examines Israel's claims

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

LONDON — The British government is urgently examining Israeli claims that up to $600 million US (at today's prices) was confiscated from banks in Mandatory Palestine by Britain during World War II.

The claim was made by Knesset banking subcommittee chair MK Yona Yahav.

He says the funds, much of which belonged to European Jews who were citizens of countries under Nazi occupation, were seized by the British Custodian of Enemy Property as "enemy assets".

In 1950, says Yahav, then-finance minister Eliezer Kaplan and then-governor of the Bank of Israel David Horovitz signed an agreement with the British government agreeing to forgo at least some of the confiscated funds if Britain lifted the ban on supplying gas, oil and arms to Israel.

However, the fate of the funds remains unclear.

According to one theory, the assets were transferred to British banks between 1940 and 1942, but in 1946 they were returned to the Anglo-Palestine Bank, later Bank Leumi.

Yahav has raised the issue with Lord Sandwell, who was appointed by the British government to investigate the issue of enemy property that was confiscated in Britain during the war.

Howard Ewing, an aide to Lord Sandwell, said that while the issue of assets confiscated in Palestine fell outside the inquiry's terms of reference, the matter had been raised with the government, which is "looking into the issue as a matter of urgency."

Ewing noted that the 1950 agreement included the payment by Britain of over $1 million in settlement of assets held by the Custodian of Enemy Property.

But Yahav said he could see no reason why Britain should not repay the assets in full and has applied for grants that will enable Bar-Ilan University students to research the issue in Israeli government and bank archives.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The return to the Toronto stage of the Canadian hit 2 Pianos, 4 Hands has been heralded by many as a triumphant homecoming for Richard Greenblatt and Ted Dykstra, the play's creators and co-stars.

The piano-playing duo completed a successful six-month run in New York City followed by a four-week engagement at the Kennedy Centre in Washington in the spring, garnering rave reviews from U.S. critics.

But for Greenblatt, 45, the critical acclaim south of the border was not as important to him as the accolades he received from his wife, friends and Canadian colleagues, he said in a recent interview at the Royal Alexandre Theatre where 2 Pianos 4 Hands runs until Sept. 5. "I don't need New York to validate my [self] worth."

Winning a Dora Mavor Moore Award in 1996 for outstanding production was validation from his peers, he said. "That's validation that's useful, as opposed to a critic."

Hailed by critics as one of the most successful Canadian plays of all times, 2 Pianos 4 Hands is a compendium of virtuoso piano performances and comical sketches chronicling the failed musical careers of two piano enthusiasts through the recreation of piano lessons, conservatory exams and competitions.

Greenblatt said the play is basically autobiographical. Both performers were classically trained, and had parallel experiences studying the piano – he in Montreal, Dykstra in Edmonton – playing festivals and winning competitions. They both seriously considered careers as classical pianists, but ultimately had to acknowledge their limitations, he said.

The company will soon be launching a British production, a U.S. tour and there will be a Canadian tour, possibly featuring two female performers, Greenblatt said.

But he conceded that finding actors who can fill his and Dykstra's shoes is difficult because it is hard to find actors that play piano well, or conversely, musicians that can act.

While 2 Pianos has been his most acclaimed work, Greenblatt, a graduate of the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London, England, has had a versatile theatrical career and is equally comfortable performing, directing and writing, he said.

He has directed more than 65 productions, winning two Dora awards for directing, and co-created several shows, among them, The Theory of Relatives (a Passover Feast), and the solo show Soft Pedalling, which toured Canada for two years.

Greenblatt said performing his work is the most satisfying of all his theatrical endeavors. He's currently collaborating on a play about siblings for the Tarragon Theatre with Toronto writer/performer Diane Flacks. "Creating with other people; that's the way I like to do it. It's an exercise in democracy. It's very satisfying."

Movie is a skewed portrait of Ayn Rand

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Alice Rosenbaum, otherwise known as Ayn Rand, was no shrinking violet, as Michael Paxton's Oscar-nominated documentary, Ayn Rand: A Sense of Life, indicates.

A novelist and a philosopher, Rand was a strong, intellectual woman who never shrank from expressing her controversial "objectivist" views, whether in books (The Fountainhead and Atlas Shrugged, among others), speeches or guest appearances on television talk shows hosted by Mike Wallace, Phil Donahue and others.

The apostle of rational self-interest and individualism, she abhorred collectivism, Communism and altruism. Not surprisingly, her opinions were fodder for ideologues who railed against the liberal welfare state in the United States and elsewhere.

At first glance, it may seem odd that this diminutive, iconoclastic and outspoken immigrant from Russia should have become the doyenne of the American conservative movement.

On further reflection, her status as an icon of the right is not as strange as it may initially appear.

Born in St. Petersburg in 1905, Rand was the daughter of a fairly prosperous and assimilated Jewish pharmacist whose livelihood was irretrievably damaged by the 1917 Bolshevik revolution.

Before she left Russia in 1926, never again to see her parents, Rand studied history and acting. Brainy and attractive, she seemed destined for more than an ordinary, run-of-the-mill life.

Brimming with a desire to be an actress, she went to Hollywood. Catching the eye of fabled director Cecil B. DeMille, Rand, an atheist, appeared as an extra in a biblical epic, King of Kings. On the set of this film, she met Frank O'Connor, a bit player whom she married and lived with for some 50 years.

After King Of Kings, Rand made ends meet by reading scripts and producing movie treatments. She continued her association with Hollywood for years after that. Indeed, she wrote the script for The Fountainhead, starring Gary Cooper, one of her idols.

Paxton, whose film is fluidly narrated by Sharon Gless, glosses over Rand's adulterous relationship with Nathaniel Branden, her younger acolyte. It's a curious gap in an otherwise comprehensive film.

Ayn Rand's real problem is that it is hagiographic in nature. It's rarely critical of Rand's philosophy and, therefore, presents a skewed portrait of this remarkable woman.

In and of itself, Ayn Rand is quite absorbing. But I suspect it would have been far more enlightening had her legion of critics been given the opportunity to voice their opinions.

Hollywoodism Voted Best Doc: Although he was in Jerusalem at the time, Toronto documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici did not show up to see his latest production Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream take the top prize several weeks ago at the Jerusalem Film Festival.

Because the awards ceremony started on a Saturday some 2½ hours before the conclusion of Shabbat, Jacobovici, who is shomer

Simcha Jacobovici

Shabbat, was unable to attend. A representative from Jacobovici's company, Associated Producers of Toronto, accepted the award for Best Documentary Film award on his behalf.

But the 45-year-old filmmaker-producer was nonetheless delighted at the prize. "I was born in Israel," he said. "It's very special to come here and be recognized in this way."

Jacobovici seems to be going from strength to strength. Last week Hollywoodism received two Gemini Award nominations. The awards ceremony is slated for Oct. 2.

For more on Jacobovici see the profile located on page 14 in this week's issue.

The Livent Circus: The show must go on at Livent, despite the recent suspensions of Livent founder Garth Drabinsky and former vice-president Myron Gottlieb for what Eye On Arts hopes will be only a short while.

The day after the dramatic news broke amidst allegations of serious financial improprieties, the Canadian Actors Equity Association (CAEA) announced that it had been assured that Livent Inc. would continue to meet its contractual commitments to its artists.

The Toronto-based company currently employs about 154 actors in such international productions as Phantom of the Opera, Show Boat, Sweet Smell of Success (now in workshop), Ragtime and Fosse, which recently opened in Toronto.

Total weekly payroll for these artists is about $360,000.

Having followed Drabinsky's high-flying career for years, Eye On Arts takes no pleasure from the sight of this self-styled Icarus plummeting from such a great height, his wings having melted from flying too close to the sun. (Closer To The Sun, incidentally, was the name of his 1995 ghost-written autobiography, a title which in retrospect seems both ironic and prophetic.)

Can a phoenix rise a second time from the ashes? Only time will tell.

In The Spotlight: Hindy Nosek-Abelson, a Toronto public relations consultant, translator and writer, has become a specialist in the marketing of Yiddish culture, and describes herself as "a bridge between the Jewish community and the outside world."

Next week Nosek-Abelson is presenting a seminar on the marketing of Yiddish culture at the International Conference of Yiddish Clubs in Los Angeles (Aug. 27 to 30). She is also delivering the Barry Shockett Memorial Lecture on the topic of Yiddish in Toronto.

"I'm going to talk about Toronto and how it has become one of the biggest Yiddish centres in North America," says Nosek-Abelson, who runs the public relations firm HNA Creative. "On a per capita basis there's a tremendous amount of activity here and I think that Toronto could be a role model for a lot of other communities."

Yiddish culture could and should be more strongly marketed, says the Yiddish maven, whose specialty is attracting a wide public, both Jewish and non-Jewish, to Yiddish cultural events. "I'm applying marketing techniques to the marketing of Yiddish culture," she says. "We can sell every product in the world by packaging and marketing, and it's done every day by corporations. There's no reason why we as a community can't sell something as important as our culture using similar techniques."

Governess leaves audience hungry

By LORI FIREMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Take two cups Jane Eyre, one cup of Yentl, sprinkle liberally with The Piano and let simmer. A recipe for success? Well, let's just say that the ingredients were there but the chef botched up the order.

In The Governess, Minnie Driver plays Rosina, a spirited adventurous young woman growing up in the early 1840s as a Sephardi Jew in London, England. Forced to find work to support her family after her father is killed, Rosina accepts a job as a governess in Scotland, but the anti-Semitism of the times necessitates her disguise as Mary Blackchurch, a Protestant woman of simple means.

Once in Skye, a remote island far from society, Rosina is overwhelmed by her employers: the affected matron of the house (Harriet Walter), her quietly brilliant husband (Tom Wilkinson) and her charge, bratty and spoiled Clementina (Florence Hoath).

But it is not only the people who are strange to her; it is their way of life. Her room becomes her solace, a haven where she can cloak herself in her father's tallit and secretly practise the Jewish rituals of her childhood.

Curious by nature and desperate for a hint of excitement, Rosina finds herself drawn to her employer, Charles Cavendish, and becomes his assistant in his pioneering studies of photography. It is not long before the two are involved in an intense and passionate relationship. Caught up in the throes of first love, Rosina struggles to maintain the memories of her other life, even as she dreams of her promising future.

As Rosina, Minnie Driver is luminous; a dazzling combination of wide-eyed innocence and fiery sensuality. Driver seems to disappear into her role, effectively capturing the spirit of her character and showing depth only hinted at in films like Good Will Hunting.

Though the script seeks to glorify Rosina at every turn, Driver is able to humanize the role, allowing us to see her complexity and to feel her pain. I was originally skeptical that Driver could be believable in the role, but while you shouldn't expect to see her at your son's bar mitzvah, she is surprisingly convincing, using her considerable talent and "ethnic" features to make the novelty casting work.

The rest of the cast is equally impressive, with Tom Wilkinson a standout in the role of Rosina's tortured lover. Impatient yet tender, meek yet violent, Wilkinson portrays Charles Cavendish as a man repressed, his first kiss with Rosina a vividly grateful and clumsy acknowledgment of his need.

Casting aside, the film wavers in its believability. In trying to convey the foreignness of Rosina's new life, writer/director Sandra Goldbacher serves up a souffle of stereotype.

The Cavendish family is exaggeratedly WASP, with matriarch Harriet Walter speaking " as though she has a lemon up her posterior," and decorating her home with moose heads. As a result, the scenes with Jewish content seem equally cartoonish and false. Rosina's Judaism is sometimes used to advance the plot, like when celebrating a Passover seder happily allows her insight into salt-fixing print photography.

As well, the nature of her deception appears to be nothing more than pulling her hair back.

With the lush Scottish landscape as scenery, the film is a visual masterpiece, where cinematographer Ashley Rowe effectively uses mirrors and light to capture mood and tone. Filmed in an almost surreal haziness, it suggests the ebb and flow of Rosina's life as she journeys into adulthood.

However, for all its good intentions, The Governess fails to be as compelling as it would like, leaving the audience hungry and wishing they had ordered the film de jour.

Alternative theatre picks on Israel

Opinion

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Israel is getting bad press in the alternative theatre scene in Toronto because of the negative image of Israeli politics in the media – print and broadcast.

This is not surprising considering the fact that theatre folk generally take their cue on politics from left-wing sources, which do not favor Israel's current line on the Mideast peace process.

Those familiar with Israel's position and the Jewish position generally can make a strong case that the media are wrong. Nevertheless, the reality is that a biased outlook is being seen on the smaller theatre stages.

Theatre artists favor the underdog and they see the Palestinians in this role. To convince them otherwise is akin to an old Yiddish expression – toyta bankes (dead leeches for a seriously ill person). Few Jews see their salvation in becoming the underdog again.

The left-wing antipathy to Israel is a reversal of the alliance that progressive groups once had with Jewish groups, in both United States and Canada, in their fight against segregation of blacks and other causes.

For example, in Toronto, Theatre Workshop, had a series of excellent plays in the 1960s and 1970s about the Chicago Seven, the McCarthy era, and the uphill fight of unions.

Perhaps one should add that theatre artists are a clannish lot – grants from funding bodies are their lifeblood – and any one who does not play ball runs the risk of being frozen out.

What is worrisome is that Jews are a favorite target of some playwrights. For example, Jason Sherman's Patience, which ran until April 5 at Tarragon Theatre, has an anti-hero Jewish main character, Reuben Field, and it won four-star reviews in the daily press while attracting sell-out crowds. It's easy to say, as some do, that the character would be just as obnoxious if he wasn't Jewish. The point is that he was Jewish. Did the playwright decree this deliberately, looking for a popular route to success?

In another Sherman play, Retreat, which ran earlier at the Tarragon, the main characters are Jewish and the plot is heavy with Jewish content. None of the characters is particularly loveable and the writer gets off some hard shots at Israel, one of his favorite targets.

When I reviewed Fires in the Mirror, staged by the black theatre company WUM in 1996, I wrote that the company had good intentions, but their play by a black activist was biased against the Orthodox Jews of Crown Heights, Brooklyn, where riots had occurred.

Shortly after that, a columnist in the Toronto Star wrote that my

BY BILL GLADSTONE

ONLY IN LOS ANGELES: THE WILSHIRE BOULEVARD TEMPLE

When your address is Hollywood and you'd like some murals in your synagogue, who are you going to call?

L.A.'s Wilshire Boulevard Temple is a magnificent structure, both inside and out. Modeled roughly after the Great Synagogue of Florence, its features seem by turns pure Byzantium and pure Hollywood. Large as a cathedral, it boasts a large rose window and a 100-foot-high mosaic inlaid dome.

These vivid paintings present highlights of biblical history with much of the pomp and pageantry of a Cecil B. De Mille motion picture. Rendered in a sort of acrylic Technicolor are dramatic scenes of the Creation, the Exodus from Egypt, the Receiving of the Ten Commandments at Sinai and many others. Painted arches and panels depict the friendship of David and Saul, the court of King Solomon, the destruction of the First Temple, the Babylonian exile, the restoration of the Second Temple and its destruction, and the Roman soldiers forcing Jews to carry the large Jewish menorah from Jerusalem as war booty.

This venerable shul was built in 1928 – the year after Al Jolson sang in The Jazz Singer, the first talkie. The studio heads, who commanded armies of talent, were emerging as Pharaonic moguls. The Warner Brothers, as members of the Wilshire congregation, sent a studio painter to the temple with instructions, apparently, to do for the building approximately what Michaelangelo had done for the Sistine Chapel.

There are still many Jews in Los Angeles who prefer to pray in unadorned surroundings, but the Wilshire congregants have evidently never been among them. They seemed eager to celebrate their heritage, to shout it out in that special mix of gratitude and pride that comes to a community that has put down solid roots and thrived.

"One of the most important things to know about the Jews of Los Angeles is that the community has always done well here," says Jerry Freedman-Habash, vice-president of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern California and an adept guide to the city's Jewish sites. "There's been very little anti-Semitism here as compared to most of the country. Part of the reason is that this city has always been a diverse city. There are many minority groups."

We spend a morning and early afternoon visiting synagogues. One building, which Freedman-Habash describes as "the temple of the stars," is decorated with a theatrical marquis bearing the words: TEMPLE SHOLOM. But none impresses me more than the Wilshire Boulevard Temple, which is properly considered a landmark of American Jewry.

The largest Reform temple in the United States is decorated with an American flag: its congregants proudly described themselves as "Americans of the Jewish faith." They were also traditionally cool to the Zionist cause: only in the last decade has the congregation permitted an Israeli flag to be displayed.

Shabbat morning services usually attract about 150 to 200 people, according to Freedman-Habash, although some 2,400 families belong to the shul. "Many of them live far from the Wilshire district but they're never going to give up their memberships, and this shul is never going to move," he says, emphasizing the special attachment the city's 600,000-strong Jewish community feels for this particular institution.

Open to visitors most weekdays, the Wilshire Boulevard Temple is located at 3663 Wilshire Blvd.

Hotel Del Capri: In a city where hotel prices seem prohibitively high for travellers of moderate means, it's nice to find a centrally-located inn that supplies basic comforts and numerous amenities at a price low enough that some might mistake it for a typo.

Situated at 10587 Wilshire Blvd. in fashionable Westwood near Beverly Hills, the Hotel Del Capri offers double-occupancy guest rooms for $100, including parking and continental breakfast. Suites with kitchenettes start at $125. A favorite of many international performing artists, the 81-room establishment is clean, quiet and well-kept, and features a flowery courtyard with a kidney-shaped pool.

A good recommendation in a Frommer's guidebook was what initially drew me to Hotel Del Capri, but its exceedingly good value will be what draws me back. 310-474-3511.

review had frightened Jewish seniors who wanted to attend the play. The charge was unfair, because I had no intention of discouraging people from attending. In fact, the seniors from the Bathurst Jewish Centre did attend. But the incident illustrates that elements in the theatre world are looking assiduously for opportunities to jump on the anti-Jewish bandwagon.

I'm not knocking Jewish actors, writers and directors who ply their trade in this setting. They have to make a living and in many cases the alternative theatres are the only game in town, leading to roles in larger theatres or lucrative TV and radio commercials.

Rabbis, patients urge Jews to become organ donors

By LEON COHEN
The Wisconsin Jewish Chronicle

MILWAUKEE — A former president of Congregation Beth Israel, Harry Lensky, has a sweatshirt on which is printed these words: "Don't take your organs to heaven, heaven knows we need them here."

This is neither a joke nor an intellectual abstraction for him. On Nov. 1, 1995, Lensky, 70, received a new liver from a 43-year-old man who had suddenly suffered a fatal cerebral hemorrhage.

For more than seven years before that, according to Lensky and his wife Phyllis, he had been suffering from the effects of sclerosing cholangitis, a disease that narrows the ducts in the marrow of the liver.

Harry was put on the waiting list in July 1995. "He was very lucky" to get a liver within four months from someone who matched his blood type, said Phyllis, who is now active in the Wisconsin Liver Foundation. "There is a terrible shortage of organs."

"I think most people have the misconception that organ donation is prohibited" under authoritative interpretations of Jewish principles and law, said Rabbi Lee Buckman, spiritual leader of the Conservative Congregation Beth Israel.

"While that was true when it was only experimental, now that it has been proven to prolong and preserve people's lives, it is permitted," he said.

Rabbi Ronald Shapiro, spiritual leader of the Reform Congregation Shalom, said some members have asked him "whether they were committing some kind of transgression" by donating their organs.

"They felt there was a Jewish tradition about body and soul needing to be able to reunite, yet they really felt they wanted to [become donors] to preserve individual life," Rabbi Shapiro said.

Rabbi Tsvi G. Schur, director of the Jewish Chaplaincy Service in Milwaukee, said that in Orthodox communities, some people were reluctant to donate because they wanted their organs to go to other Jews.

They say this, Rabbi Schur emphasized, not out of disdain or hatred for non-Jews but on grounds that "all Jews are one family" and one has an "obligation to save a member of one's family first."

But he added that halachic authority Rabbi Moshe Feinstein issued a ruling saying, "Today in a mixed society, everybody needs everybody else and there is no question" that Jews can donate organs to non-Jews.

Some Orthodox and Conservative Jews have expressed concerns about Jewish eschatology – ideas about what will happen at "the end of days." These teachings include the idea that one must be buried with all of one's body parts so that when the Messiah comes and the dead are resurrected, one will resurrect completely.

But Rabbi Schur said that commentaries on these ideas have indicated that organs that have been donated for the halachically valid purpose of saving a life "will be regenerated or you will be able to live without them."

Halachic issues debated

Other halachic issues around transplants are being debated within Orthodox and Conservative Judaism. In the Orthodox community, Rabbi Schur said, the big issue is determining when death occurs so that organs may be removed.

One camp is willing to go with the modern medical definition of death as cessation of brain activity. Others adhere to the more traditional definition that death occurs when breathing and heartbeat stop.

The medical problem is that organs are more likely to be successfully transplanted if taken from someone brain dead than from someone whose heart has stopped. The halachic problem, according to Rabbi Schur, is that "you can't kill someone to save someone else," and therefore some Orthodox authorities consider removing a beating heart from a brain dead person as murder.

In the Conservative movement, said Rabbi Buckman, the primary debate is over whether donating an organ is a meritorious but optional act of kindness or is an obligation under the Halachah: "Do not stand by the blood of your neighbor" (Leviticus 19:16) can be interpreted as, if you have the means and opportunity to help someone in mortal peril, it is a sin to refrain.

Rabbi Buckman said he personally views organ donation as an obligation, and so has signed the organ donation permission form on the back of his driver's licence.

But such debates may seem academic when compared with what transplantation has done for someone like Harry Lensky.

To be sure, a transplant is not easy to live with, medically or psychologically.

Then there is the "bittersweet thing," as Phyllis put it, of knowing that one's life has been saved through someone else's death.

The Lenskys have been carrying on a "blind correspondence" with the family of the liver's donor – neither family knows the other's name and letters are sent through a third party. Some day, they may feel comfortable with the idea of meeting.

"For a family to decide to donate organs is the kindest, biggest mitzvah they can do," said Phyllis.

England's Cornwall has a mystique all its own

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

CORNWALL, England — "When our train crosses that bridge ahead, we'll be in Cornwall," pointed out the man sitting opposite us. He was bringing his new wife from Vancouver to meet his parents, and the catch in his voice was as much about going home as introducing his bride.

Cornwall, England's most southwesterly county has a mystique all its own. A profound attachment to land, legend and history imbues the Cornish with an uncommon perspective. Though they co-exist with the rest of the country, they often refer to other English as "foreigners."

This was the territory – rolling hills ablaze with yellow gorse, awesome seascapes, wild moors – that my friend Maryleah and I were entering. Admittedly a romanticist, I was enticed by such fantasies as Daphne Du Maurier's Jamaica Inn and Frenchman's Creek as well as by current writers' lyrical descriptions of the countryside. My enthusiasm was contagious and we set out to explore Cornwall together.

We had taken a risk, relying on an ad in a travel magazine to book a "deluxe" package through Cornish Connections, a husband-and-wife team, John and Pat Saunders. The package included the Westcott Hotel with breakfast and dinner plus five days touring, just the two of us. Based in one location, we could see whatever we wanted and come back to the same place at night.

It cost more than the conventional tour but wasn't exorbitant and we could ride along hedgerow- lined byways inaccessible to the buses, roads so narrow that passing an occasional oncoming car involved one driver backing up to let the other proceed. Cows meandered at random.

We had stayed overnight with friends in London before boarding the train to Truro where the Saunders met us in a spotless van for the brief drive to the family-operated Westcott in coastal Falmouth.

Almost as soon as we pulled up at the gabled building we knew that we had lucked in. Mike Craig, the hotelier, welcomed us with a cup of tea and showed us to our en suite room overlooking the sea. The century old hotel had been beautifully refurbished, and the Craigs provided caring personal attention.

Each evening, guests were invited to take tea or coffee in the lounge. We met a couple from Colorado – he had been stationed in Falmouth with the U.S. Navy during World War II; two women intent on inspecting every public garden around; a mother and daughter from Wales; and a quiet young man attached to the Royal Navy, who on our last night, unexpectedly brought out several drawing books filled with sensitive sketches and watercolors of ships, ports and the sea.

Cornwall is dotted with small cities, fishing villages and mining towns. In five days we experienced leaps in time from prehistoric standing stones (grave markers) in farmers' fields to a contemporary branch of the Tate Gallery in the artists' colony of St. Ives.

Our first stop was St. Michael's Mount, "the jewel in Cornwall's crown," a granite crag rising offshore from Mount's Bay. It is dominated by a castle which was originally a 12th century priory, later a fortress, and now the home of the titled St. Aubyn family who live in one wing while tourists gawk at hoary treasures in the public sector.

We reveled in the Lost Gardens of Heligan, neglected for over 40 years but presently undergoing restoration, with apple trees again trained to form an archway and hidden rhododendrons appearing phoenix-like in massive glory.

Reminiscent of Caesarea's Roman amphitheatre but dating back only to the 1930s, is the Minack Theatre, also facing the sea, the dream of Rowena Cade, who physically, with local assistance, lugged rocks to provide seating. In season, plays, dance and opera are staged.

We saw the real Jamaica Inn and Windswept Bodmin Moor, the country church where Rosamund Pilcher, author of The Shell Seekers, married, and the former home of D.H. Lawrence. The obligatory cathedral in Truro combined superb architecture with intricate adornment.

Wandering in several towns we were especially taken with Polperro, a fishing village with brightly painted doors and flowers everywhere. On the wall of a very old home we discovered an intriguing sign, The Jew's House. Beside the door, another sign read, Shalom. The occupant knew nothing about the signs, only that he was "required" to leave them up.

We saw no other hint of a Jewish community in Cornwall but our friends in London said that many years ago there were Jewish merchants in the busy ports and the signs could indicate that the property once belonged to a moneylender. A British Tourist authority representative had no explanation.

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

FORT ERIE — Nearly every Jewish mother has the same dream for her daughter: a good eduction, an interesting career, marriage to a nice Jewish boy, a home in the suburbs, children, and maybe some time for the temple sisterhood or another women's organization.

Never would a mother imagine her daughter getting up at 5 a.m. each day, going to work wearing muddy boots and dirty blue jeans. Nor would that mother imagine spending her time worrying about a huge animal that might accidentally step on, kick, or (deliberately or playfully) bite her precious darling.

But such is the lifestyle of Montreal native Rosalie Raphael, who trains a one-horse stable at the Fort Erie Race Track and owns a nearby farm.

While big-name trainers like Jim Day dress in fancy casual clothes during training hours and have dozens of grooms who actually work with their horses, Raphael does it all herself.

That means cleaning out her horse's stall, brushing her, getting her ready for their morning exercise under jockeys or exercise boys, walking her "cool" after exercise, bathing her, feeding her, working on her legs, then maybe taking her out for a relaxing few mouthfuls of grass.

Raphael supports her year-old mare, Weave, by sewing race track silks (at $125 and up per set) which aren't made of silk but nylon, which is sturdier, and other race horse equipment.

"Sewing is work, so is training for other people," she said. "Training your own horse is fun.

Raphael remembered "sneaking to a barn to ride before going to school in Montreal. Then I got married, had my own show horse...

"One day I wandered into the Blue Bonnets track. It seemed like heaven – if you loved horses.

"But racing breaks up most marriages, unless both are horse lovers. My former husband would have something social on the calendar, but I'd be off to Suffolk Downs in Boston because one of my horses would be ready to win.

"You're on the road, your husband feels deserted all the time if he's not involved except on weekends. The horses are first in your mind and no one wants to play second fiddle."

Rosalie Raphael and her horse Weave.

At first, admitted Raphael, "my family thought I was worse than silly – no children, not eating kosher food when travelling... Now I guess I'm the black sheep of the family."

About the only time her race-tracking gained family approval came many years ago: "I had a horse named Buster's Mark entered in a grass race with Sandy Hawley, then an apprentice, riding.

"I gave him quite detailed instructions and he probably thought I didn't know what I was doing. He knew that the horse had only had one workout on the turf, in very, very slow time. And he opened on the odds board at 99-to-1.

"What he didn't know was that the exercise rider in that workout weighed 170 pounds!

"Everything worked out; he won, and paid $92.40.

"I had called my uncle Morris beforehand and he won a big bet; he owned the Berke's pharmacy chain in Montreal."

Raphael grew up in Westmount and attended McGill for two years before marrying. "I should have stayed in college," she said. "I was studying to be a pathologist and remembered walking into a laboratory at Montreal General Hospital. The men there thought I'd pass out, but I didn't!"

With only one horse to train, Raphael admitted "You have to cash a good bet to keep solvent." But she added, "everything has to break just right for Weave to win. The most she's ever earned in purse money is $6,000. But she's much sounder this year."

Raphael bought Weave three years ago for $2,000 – as much for her good looks and affectionate nature as for her speed.

"She has soft eyes and a gorgeous face, and she really likes me. I think she would come into my house, lie on the couch and watch TV with me."

The big mistake most trainers or owners make, she asserted, "is not turning their stock over, running them cheap and letting someone else claim them and live with their problems.

"I run Weave for a $4,000 or $5,000 claiming price. I know she would win at $3,200, but I don't want to lose her.

"She's so pretty and so sweet."

The Inside Back

Those wandering Jews

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

It seems more than coincidental that the Torah parshiot read over the summer deal with B'nai Yisrael travelling through the Sinai desert, camping and packing, kvetching, mutinying, more packing and unpacking. Not to mention putting on all that sunscreen on a million plus kids every single day.

And true to form, their descendants follow this time-honored tradition with great zeal and dedication, if not parental exhaustion.

I can't help but draw my inspiration from the Torah's first reference to this, namely Jacob travelling to Eretz Yisrael, with four wives, 12 kids and countless thousands of livestock in tow. When his brother Esau asks him to join him ahead, he points out that the kinder and sheep can't be pushed that fast.

Of course, we all know (or rationalize) that the trip is as important as the destination itself. So in our family, we like to pretend we're modern-day explorers while we drive, and drive, and drive – that is, explorers who have to listen to non-stop children's tapes.

When you think about it, it's no surprise that the great explorers throughout history got where they did; they didn't have their children travelling with them.

The Vikings wouldn't even have made it out of Scandinavia with their kids and wives along for the ride. Their wives would have been continually chakking them to do maybe a little less pillaging and plundering, since the kinder were watching.

For that matter, Vasco da Gama never would have made it off the continent if he had taken along the kids, who accidentally mistook his navigational map of the stars for their connect-the-dots puzzle.

How far do you think Columbus would have got if he had had to land ashore every half hour for bathroom breaks? (Couldn't you have gone before we left home? Why didn't you go at the last port we left 10 minutes ago?) You can almost imagine him at the helm of his ship, trying to spot land while his children keep asking him, "Are we there yet?" or fighting over who got to steer the ship. Not to mention all the seasickness.

Marco Polo wouldn't have made it out of Italy with the kids. Instead, they'd be looking for a nice hotel with maybe a pool along the way, maybe some attractions for the kids. And if he ever did get to the Far East, would he really agree that all this was worth it just for some spices, lockshen and fireworks as souvenirs?

Much of the eastern half of Canada would still be undiscovered if Jacques Cartier had taken his kids along with him. He'd have to keep telling the kids to sit down in the canoe; explain once again why no, they can't carry the canoe, it's too heavy; and deal with their always wanting to switch seats for a better view and splashing each other through sloppy paddling.

And what about his American counterparts, Lewis and Clark? They never would have got past New Jersey if they had to stop all the time to make sure the two families' kids got along and shared toys, not to mention having to double back because Fluffy was left behind at the last campsite. And dealing with the black flies and mosquitoes? Remember, this predates bug repellent.

So, it's quite easy to understand why it took Moses and B'nai Yisrael 40 years to get to Eretz Yisrael, where it could have easily taken the adults alone 10 days. In fact, it's a miracle they made it there after all, even after 40 years, without leaving any Fluffys behind.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I am going to a different high school than all of my friends this year and I am very, very nervous. I am really frightened that I will have no friends at my new school and that I will be a loser all through high school. I am usually outgoing among my friends, but around new people I am shy. I know that I will still be able to see all of my old friends after school and on the weekends, but what if they don't want to see me and they make new friends? Please help me because I really don't want to sit alone in the cafeteria.

High School Blues

Dear High School Blues,

Don't worry. Many high school students enter their school not knowing anyone. You are not alone. There are many opportunities to meet new people and make friends, even during the first few days of school. For example, the people whose lockers are located next to yours will definitely be friendly and they may not know anyone either.

In addition, classes also provide a great opportunity to meet new people. You can find shared interests in almost any class.

Schools also have many clubs and teams. Try out for the teams and join a few clubs. During these meetings, practices and events everyone will be friendly and hoping to make new friends. You will make friends and your outgoing nature will shine through!

During the first few days of high school, everyone is anxious and hoping to make new friends, even those who already have friends at the school.

In regards to the friends that you are leaving behind, you have to remember that you are all moving on. Just like you are making new friends, they too are going to be making friends. Calling your old friends on a regular basis will help maintain your friendship.

Good luck and have a great year at school!

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto.

Court rules on secession

Reaction mixed in Jewish community

By RON CSILLAG and DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporters

Minorities across the country, including Canadian Jewry, are still digesting last week's historic Supreme Court of Canada ruling on Quebec's secession – a ruling in which both sides are finding comfort.

The decision, described in some circles as Solomonic, states that while unilateral secession of Quebec would be illegal, the provinces and the federal government would be obliged to negotiate in good faith if a "clear majority" of Quebecers voted for independence in response to an unambiguous question.

Legal scholars described the ruling as a lesson in even-handedness and common sense, and both sides had reason to hail it: Federalists say it upholds their view that Quebec cannot leave on its own, while sovereigntists say it vindicates their long-held claim that Ottawa would have to negotiate if Quebec decides to quit Confederation.

Overall, Jewish reaction to the ruling was positive, with national organizations saying it is reassuring.

But Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), was somewhat circumspect.

CJC Quebec chair Dorothy Zalcman Howard called the opinion "reassuring to our community," and "logical and consistent with our expectations."

"We must keep in mind that the decision is a legal one, and not political," Zalcman Howard said, "so CJC will continue to advocate a strategy on behalf of Canadian unity."

'Most important case ever'

By IRWIN COTLER
Special to The CJN

Chief Justice Antonio Lamer characterized the Quebec Secession Reference as the most important case ever to come before the Supreme Court of Canada.

When the court delivered its unanimous opinion last Thursday, Aug. 20, it clearly became the most important judgment in the history of Canadian constitutional law. Moreover, it had the unusual, if not historic, distinction of being characterized as a "Solomonic" judgment in which both the federal and Parti Québécois governments claimed victory.

Commentary

The federalist side claimed victory on the grounds that the Supreme Court had unanimously held that Quebec had no right to unilateral secession either under Canadian law or under international law; the péquiste side claimed victory on the grounds that the Supreme Court had not precluded the secession option and indeed, had acknowledged the legitimacy of its negotiated outcome.

It is not surprising, then, that media and political pundits were quick to characterize a unanimous Supreme Court opinion in which each side claimed victory as "Solomonic." Others, less charitable, while still acknowledging its Solomonic character, said the judgment had simply returned us back to square 1 – to the status quo – i.e., that both sides could claim victory because they were both back where they started.

But a careful reading of the judgment will disclose that the Quebec notion of plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose has been turned on its head. Everything has changed, and the legal and political status quo respecting the secessionist option will never be the same again. While the true Solomonic character of the

'Threats' Made On Web

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) says it is treating "very seriously" what it says are personal threats against its executive vice-president Frank Dimant and the Jewish community. The threats were posted in a readers' forum on the Web site of the weekly, NOW magazine.

BBC says it contacted the police hate crimes unit and commended NOW for removing the posting from the site. It also asked for a meeting with NOW to prevent future postings of this nature. The posting referred to a newsgroup headed "Post your anti-kike comments there."

'Heritage Week' Dropped

MARKHAM, Ont. — The Town of Markham last week scuttled a request to proclaim "European Heritage Week" in October. The town council was going to pass the proclamation, when a last-minute call from Canadian Jewish Congress alerted it to the fact that the neo-Nazi Heritage Front was behind the campaign. In the past few years, several towns and cities have been duped into passing the proclamation.

ISRAEL

Hezbollah Responsible

JERUSALEM — The fundamentalist Hezbollah claimed responsibility for the death of an Israeli soldier in southern Lebanon last week. Ori Samuelov, 21, was killed by a roadside bomb detonated near his army patrol. Four other Israeli soldiers were wounded in the blast. Samuelov was the 10th Israeli soldier killed in Lebanon this year.

Dispute Near End?

JERUSALEM — An end to the dispute between Israel and the Vatican over the appointment of a new Palestinian bishop to the Galilee appears imminent. An Israeli spokesperson said Israel would not oppose the appointment of Boutros Moualem if it received assurances that he would not engage in political activity.

Barak Urges Elections

JERUSALEM — Israeli opposition leader Ehud Barak urged the Knesset committee responsible for preparing a bill that would force early elections to expedite the process, despite the summer recess. Committee chair Hanan Porat said he plans neither to bury the bill nor to accelerate the legislative process.

More Housing for Golan

JERUSALEM — An Israeli government committee last week voted to build 2,300 housing units in the southern part of the Golan Heights. The committee also decided to build 2,500 vacation units in the same area.

Iraqi Paper Blames Jews

BAGHDAD — An Iraqi newspaper has claimed that the Monica Lewinsky scandal is a Jewish plot aimed at toppling President Bill Clinton. "The basic Zionist game has become clear," the daily newspaper Babel wrote, adding that the scandal's ultimate goal is to replace Clinton with Vice-President Al Gore, "who is known for his pro-Zionist stand."

More Crosses Appear

WARSAW — More crosses appeared near the site of the Auschwitz death camp. Fundamentalist Polish Catholics added to the more than 100 crosses already at the site one day after the Polish government took legal control of a field outside the camp as a first step toward removing them. Jewish groups have called for the crosses' removal.

Insurance Firm Settles

ROME — Italy's largest insurance firm, Assicurazioni Generali, agreed to pay $100 million as part of a settlement of a class-action lawsuit filed by Holocaust survivors. Generali's settlement involves opening its records, which could disclose important information about the wartime activities of other European insurers.

Believes Banks Will Settle

BERLIN — The leader of Germany's Jewish community said he is confident that two of the country's largest private banks would soon settle an $18-billion class-action suit filed by U.S. Holocaust survivors. Ignatz Bubis made the prediction days after Switzerland's two largest commercial banks reached a $1.25-billion settlement of Holocaust-era claims. The class-action suits accuse Deutsche Bank and Dresdner Bank of knowingly trading in gold looted from Jews during the Holocaust.

More Powers For Prince

Notes Possibly Authentic

AMSTERDAM — Anne Frank experts said it is possible that recently discovered notes purportedly written by the teenage diarist are authentic. The notes, in which Frank reportedly has harsh words to describe her parents' marriage, are in the possession of a former employee of the Anne Frank house here.

Jewish Festival But No Jews

REGGIO EMILIA, Italy — There is no Jewish community any more in Reggio Emilia, a town in northern Italy famous for its Parmesan cheese.

During the High Holy Days this year, Reggio Emilia will be the co-host, along with neighboring Parma, of a three-week arts festival aimed at providing Italians with insights into the influence Jews have had on Italian and global culture.

The festival kicks off Sept. 19, two days before Rosh Hashanah, with a five-hour celebration of the holiday featuring Jewish theatre, music, dance and food, involving Israeli and Italian performers and personalities.

"It should be a lot of fun," said Francesco Spagnolo, director of a Milan-based study centre on Jewish music, who will take part in the event.

The festival will continue through Oct. 10, with a series of theatre performances, readings, concerts and exhibits. Among the scheduled participants is the Israeli writer A.B. Yehoshua, who will launch the Italian edition of one of his books.

CNE pavilion celebrates Israel at 50

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — After a year of planning, the Israel at 50 pavilion opened its doors last week at the 120th annual Canadian National Exhibition (CNE).

Three thousand invited guests, including Israeli Deputy Prime Minister and Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav, Tel Aviv mayor Roni Milo, Canadian Ambassador to Israel David Berger, MP Elinor Caplan and Toronto Sun publisher Paul Godfrey, took a sneak peek at the 107,000 square-foot pavilion the night before the CNE's official opening at a gala evening hosted by the CBC's National host Hana Gartner.

The pavilion's feature attraction is a mosaic floor from a fifth-century Galilean synagogue discovered accidentally by a team of Hebrew University archeologists in 1994 near Tzippori, Israel.

Inscribed in Greek, Hebrew and Aramaic, it depicts scenes relevant to Judaism, Islam and Christianity, including the zodiac, the sacrifice of Isaac and an explanation of major Jewish holidays.

The mosaic floor is being overseen by the Royal Ontario Museum, and it is its first exhibit in a non-museum setting.

"People are very interested in the way it has been preserved and in the information you can get from the mosaic," said opening-day guide Elaine Steiner, one of over 1000 volunteers who will help keep the pavilion running until Sept. 7.

Guests could also visit a gallery featuring Israeli and Jewish artists or take a ride on a camel in the pavilion's 12,000-sq.-ft. Negev desert exhibit.

Israeli-born artist Dubie Arie's 38 ft. x 7 ft. mural The Mission, which took 20 years to paint and depicts 4000 years of Jewish history in fiery color, hangs on the desert's far wall.

The pavilion features over 30 vendor booths including a gift shop where guests can buy souvenirs such as a $400 dollar commemorative Roots baseball jacket.

The pavilion is sponsored by a consortium of 175 Toronto-area Jewish community organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel.

On the pavilion's centre stage, which during the fair features daily performances, lectures, fashion shows and food demonstrations, chair Karen Morton recited Shehechianu and told the gala's assembled media and guests the "evening marks the culmination of one year of planning, negotiation and just plain hard work by hundreds of volunteers. It could never have happened without you."

Morton said portraying the diversity of Israel in one exhibit was a challenge, "so we took the easy way out and decided to show you a little bit of everything."

Supreme Court's role

The release last week by the Supreme Court of Canada of its decision in the "Quebec reference" provided a poignant example in the Canadian context of the seamless interweaving of democratic values, the rule of law and civility.

That example is an appropriate segue for the excerpts that I promised to publish from the interviews in Justice, the quarterly bulletin of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, with Aharon Barak, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Israel, and with Justice Menachem Elon who sat on the court from 1977 to 1994.

The two interviews run for more than 13 pages. The excerpts do not, indeed cannot, convey the full sense of the complete interviews.

Justice: "...[D]on't you think the court usurps the powers of elected officials by judges who are not accountable?"

Barak: "...As for non-accountability, that is the major strength of the judiciary. We need judicial review by a body which is not accountable in the political sense, as otherwise, its way of thinking would be the same as that of the administrators.

The whole idea is that the actions of the administration be checked by a body which is outside the executive branch, which is independent, and which always asks itself to what extent the decision fits the basic values of society, and does not impose the values of the majority.

The idea of constitutional law is that even the legislature is subject to basic values, and that even the majority cannot breach some basic values. If the judge was to be elected in the same way as the legislator, he would think like a legislator, i.e., in the same terms as the majority. He is not cleverer than the legislator. For me, non-accountability is not a weakness of the judiciary but a strength."

Justice: "How do you see the evolution of the Basic Laws in Israel?"

Barak: "The real effect of the Basic Law is that it has converted Israel into a constitutional democracy. It has changed the way of thinking of politicians, lawyers and the public at large. We no longer talk as much of the power of the state but more in the terminology of rights which create the power of the state...[M]y great hope lies in the students in the law schools who are now learning about rights, for whom rights have now become part and parcel of their way of thinking... 'Dignity of the human being'...has become everyday terminology. This indirect cultural effect, this movement into an era of rights and not of powers, is of great significance..."

* * *

Justice: "Today we have the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom; how do you regard this law?"

Elon: We are in a new situation. It is the first time in the history of the Jewish State that we are bound to use Jewish law not only in Basic Laws, but in every decision...[T]he common purpose clause of the new Basic Laws enshrines "the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State (Elon's emphasis), [and] a significant element of the word "Jewish" includes Jewish law.

Every judge who is faced with a constitutional problem, is now bound to anchor his decision in the values of a Jewish and democratic state, and note that the term 'Jewish' precedes 'democratic.' Of course, the term 'Jewish' also includes Zionist values, but one cannot say that it does not include the Talmud. That would be nonsense. Today...there is too little knowledge of Jewish law, and I regret this greatly because the legal system is the culture of a nation."

Justice: "What are your views on the performance of the Rabbinical Courts...?"

Elon: "...There was a period during which the Rabbinical Courts were very active and creative. For example, during the time of the first Chief Rabbi, Rabbi Kook, a Court of Appeal was established. Such a Court never existed before under the Halachah...Unfortunately, this creativity has stopped. I think that the dayanim should be more involved in public life. They must know what is going on...Yeshiva learning is not enough in this modern world."

Justice: "...[Do] you think equally the Judges in the civil courts should learn more Jewish law?"

Elon: "Yes...Ways must be found...Equality must be created between general law and Jewish law. It is a mater for the whole nation. It has nothing to do with coercion or religion but is part of the culture of the nation.

"We are in a very difficult situation today, in terms of the clash between religious and secular sectors of the public. Jewish law is a wonderful way to do something in common without religious coercion. We will use the sources, sit together, study, and most important speak to each other. We will not be talking about faith and religion but about pure issues of the law. We will be talking with our forefathers. The legal profession and the courts can do a lot about solving the hatred which exists today.

"The Supreme Court has played, and continues to play, a prominent role in Israeli society...What is important is to see that [the Supreme Court's] role will be to serve as a mediator, making peace between the different approaches within Israeli society."

UJA Federation's Zbar heads to Queen's Park

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When he first started as a jail guard in Ottawa 23 years ago, Morris Zbar wondered if he would ever be in charge.

Today, at age 50, as the newly appointed assistant deputy minister of community corrections for the Ontario government, Zbar has seen his dream partly come true. He started his new job on Aug. 24.

Zbar left his position as vice-president of community planning and development for UJA Federation with regret.

"It was a difficult decision to make, but when I got the call, I couldn't say no. UJA Federation is doing a wonderful job for the community and you can bet your bottom dollar that I'll be a volunteer with them again."

Morris Zbar

New assistant deputy minister of community corrections

Zbar found himself in Ottawa in 1975 desperately in need of a job when few were to be found. He had a wife (the former Margaret Levendel of Ottawa) and a young son to support. He had come from Israel with his family because unstable conditions in Africa had made it untenable to continue his studies for a doctorate in African Political studies at Hebrew University.

"I saw an ad in a newspaper for a counsellor at the Regional Detention Centre on Innis Road in Ottawa," he says of his job search.

"Gary Meyer, the superintendent, asked me: 'Why does a nice Jewish boy like you want this job?'

"I said I thought I would be counselling inmates and advising on literary programs.

"The superintendent laughed and took me on a tour. 'You see all those men in uniform over there. They're guards and that's what you will be.'"

But Zbar says he is not sorry he took the job because it has helped him immeasurably in his climb up the ladder in the ministry. ("I hired that man," Meyer has reminded everyone.) In his new job, he will be responsible for probation, parole, young offenders (boot camps) and community programs, and he has not lost any of his early enthusiasm for steering inmates into newer and more productive lives.

But it is a wrench for him to leave UJA Federation, he says, particularly because he has just returned from a mission to Israel and Moscow with 28 other Torontonians.

"There are half a million Jews, most of them elderly, in the former Soviet Union, and they need help. We saw them in such poverty that my wife cried. One woman living alone was afraid to go out because people were so unfriendly. She was living in darkness because her electricity had been cut off."

The goals of UJA Federation are close to Zbar's heart, because he is convinced that it has helped the Toronto Jewish community to become one of the three most important in the Diaspora.

In addition to holding numerous posts in the Corrections Ministry for 14 years, Zbar also had top jobs with the Ontario Culture Ministry beginning in 1988, when the new Liberal government decided to move the headquarters of Corrections to North Bay.

As an active volunteer for community causes, Zbar has been vice-chair of the Ontario Heritage Foundation, a position he will now give up, and was chair of the North York Library board when its new Central Library went up. He is also stepping down as president of Operation Springboard.

Born in Paris, France, he is the son of the late Sarah and Jacob Zbar, Holocaust survivors from Poland who escaped to the east, were sent to labor camps in Siberia, and eventually went to France.

He grew up in Montreal, and received an honors BA from McGill University and an MA in political science from McMaster.

His wife has been a junior kindergarten teacher at the Bayview campus of United Synagogue Day School for 20 years. They have two children, David, 26, in sports marketing, and Ilana, 21, a graduate of the University of Western Ontario, who is off to Israel for six months to study.

ASHKENAZ....A Festival of New Yiddish Culture seeks a Fundraising Director to implement a complete fundraising strategy for the next Festival, August 30 to September 6, 1999. Working closely with the Board and the Executive Director, the Fundraising Director will oversee foundation, individual donor and corporate sponsorship campaigns and a spring Gala. The ideal candidate will be self-motivated, familiar with the Toronto Jewish community and have at least five years fundraising experience in an arts or Jewish organization setting. The position is approximately half-time; salary commensurate with experience.

Students, teachers take tour into history

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Brett Stevenson had read extensively about the Holocaust, but until her participation in this summer's Holocaust and Hope Student Study Tour in Israel the 17-year-old high school student had "never been so close to history."

Hearing firsthand accounts from Holocaust survivors had the most impact on her, she told The CJN in a telephone interview from her home in Whitehorse, Yukon.

"The last survivor who spoke, I knew would probably be the last survivor I ever heard speak to me," she said.

The trip was "an eye-opening experience," said Chiara Lacey, 17, of Charlottetown. She was struck by the stories of Righteous Gentiles "and how it didn't take money or anything. It just took one person who had courage."

As a result of the trip, Lacey plans to speak to high school students in her hometown and away at university this year.

Stevenson wants to approach a local drama club about mounting a play against racism.

Joanna Laskey, who founded a human rights group last year at her Gagetown, N.B. high school, spoke to her vice-principal before the trip about the possibility of declaring a month for Holocaust education.

She also plans to do some public speaking. "There'll be a lot of stuff I'll be telling people that I would have never considered before, like remembering the victims' names, and you want to remember them as they were before [the Holocaust]."

The ripple effect extends across Canada. Eighteen students, the majority non-Jewish, participated in the tour, which was designed by BBC's League for Human Rights and Canadian Friends of Massuah.

The tour, running this year for the second time, is affiliated with the League's Holocaust and Hope Educators' Study Tour, which takes teachers to Germany, Poland and Israel.

The Educators' Tour, now in its 12th year, runs biannually. Almost 100 educators have participated since its inception.

The two programs overlapped for the first time this year in Israel, at the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust, located near Tel Aviv.

For Marlyn Keaschuk, an English and history teacher from the town of Herbert, Sask. (population about 1,000), the Educators' Tour strengthened her resolve to incorporate what she's learned into her classroom lessons, but left her with unresolved questions about Israel's political situation.

"There are no easy answers there, and I thought there were. I thought if I knew more, things would be clearer."

Keaschuk, who's been teaching for 20 years and has a master's degree in moral education, has always included the Holocaust in her 20th century history classes, although she is not required to. She believes in addressing the issues with sensitivity, avoiding sensationalism and stressing "the human side."

She now plans to be a more vocal opponent of "critical thinking exercises" involving classroom use of tools like neo-Nazi Web sites.

The trip "changed the way I look at the world. I know I'll be much more aware of language implications. I will never take some things for granted again. I'll never assume that people will behave in a moral way."

Keaschuk maintains she's not disillusioned. "I think one of the things we have to do is to focus on the righteous people. In the midst of all of this, there were still good people."

Anniversary celebrated

"We thank God we have succeeded to fulfil our dreams of many centuries, despite many difficulties...and now we are celebrating the anniversary of Israel, the Jewish state," Katsav said.

CNE Association president Robert Bowman said he hoped the pavilion would reinforce Canada's multicultural values of tolerance, and showcase "one of the most progressive nations in the world."

The crowd also heard greetings from federal Transport Minister David Collennette, as well as Ontario Minister for Citizenship, Culture and Recreation Isabel Basett who extended greetings from Premier Mike Harris.

"You don't have to be Jewish to feel deeply about the great country of Israel," she said, adding that she was gratified her late husband, 1973 Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree John Bassett, lived to see Israel's 50th anniversary before his death earlier this year.

Organizers were disappointed by the absence of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman, who attended the opening gala for the CNE's featured country, The Phillipines, taking place the same evening in an adjacent hall.

"There was a [scheduling] mix-up that I don't want to get into," UJA Federation communications director Howard English said.

The mayor told The CJN he was "too tired" after arriving on a late plane from Florida the night of the gala, and could only attend The Phillipines opening, which ended about the same time as the Israel at 50 festivities.

He said the city was well-represented by councilors Joe Pantalone, Chris Korwin-Kuczynski and Brian Ashton, but they did not address the gala because Lastman had expected to be there.

Lastman received a guided tour from Katsav on opening day. Hamming for the cameras, the pair delighted pavilion visitors and organizers by taking a camel ride and drinking Israel at 50 PC Cola.

Lastman and Katsav also managed to find their way onto the pavilion's centre stage for an impromptu chorus-line rendition of Hallelujah with the Israeli Scouts Friendship Caravan.

After the concert, Lastman said he plans to bring his grandchildren, who attend Hebrew school, to the pavilion. "They know everything and they really will enjoy it."

"I have never seen a pavilion as beautiful as this one," Lastman said to enthusiastic applause. "We're very proud to have it here in Toronto at our CNE...Please enjoy and spend lots of money."

Doing his best on opening day, was Michael Akoka, a visitor from Kfar Saba, who along with mother Annette enjoyed a "very delicious" corned beef sandwich from the Kosher Market. "From each thing in Israel they took a little bit," he said.

Philippine-born Armando Bayona, who met his wife while working as a UN maintenance worker in Nahariya from 1983-86, enjoyed time with children Amy, 6, and Arlyne, 9, at My Jewish Discovery Place: A Children's Museum. He entered a draw for a trip to Israel by buying a tree from JNF. El Al is also giving away eight pairs of tickets to Israel over the course of the CNE.

"Israel is the best," said Bayona. "If I can visit again, I will."

CORRECTION

In Morton Weinfeld's column last week (Aug. 20) entitled "Competing Demograpic Forces in Israel," we incorrectly published that the percent of the population of Ashkelon comprised of recent immigrants (1989-1997) was 80 percent. The correct figure is 30 percent. We apologize for the error.

Quintessentially Canadian

The Supreme Court decision last week in the "Quebec reference case" was quintessentially Canadian, choosing a middle line, rejecting the hard line; encouraging moderation, discouraging extremism; raising the possibility of the need to compromise, abhorring the expediency of espousing unilateralism.

With one voice, the court decreed that Quebec has neither the right under Canadian law, nor the right under international law, to secede unilaterally from Canada. But the court also ruled that should the people of Quebec choose to leave the federation, the rest of Canada would have to negotiate terms of separation.

The nub of the ruling is as follows: "The Constitution vouchsafes order and stability, and accordingly secession of a province 'under the Constitution' could not be achieved unilaterally, that is, without principled negotiation with other participants in Confederation within the existing constitutional framework…

"[A] clear majority vote in Quebec on a clear question in favor of secession would confer democratic legitimacy on the secession initiative which all of the other participants in Confederation would have to recognize…

"The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order could not be indifferent to a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The other provinces and the federal government would have no basis to deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others."

Thus, the court placed the question of separatism within a legal framework and provided parameters of restraint and reasonableness for the political debate which, through the release of the decision last Thursday, returns to the public agenda.

In firm, well-reasoned language, the ruling effectively slams the door shut on the radical, extremist ideologues at both ends of the debate who advocate, respectively, separatism or federalism by all means and at all costs.

But if the extremist ideologues have been left standing outside the door, the tent still seems to accommodate the "mainstream" ideologues like Premier Lucien Bouchard, who prefer the language of provocation and ridicule to that of calm, respectful argument.

Even though he does not recognize the validity of the Supreme Court's judgment, he nevertheless offered that it "poisons" the federalist cause. He preened that the ruling confers on separatists the ability to woo undecided Quebec voters, the so-called "soft federalists" by pointing out they need no longer fear that the rest of Canada would not negotiate separation with Quebec.

But he misses the point, and has missed the point since the very beginning of the debate.

The choice must be put to the people of Quebec honestly, without ruse or pretext. And when they choose, yet again, which society they wish to belong in, to help build up and to pass down to their children, they will do so on the basis of positive reasons, not negative ones. They will choose the society, though imperfect, in which, by constitution and tradition, they are free to pursue the deepest stirrings of their soul, yet obliged as well to tolerance, fellowship and good citizenship toward all others.

What better evidence could there be of such a society than last week's decision itself by the Supreme Court of Canada, thoughtful, reasoned, principled, forbearing and understanding of the paramount significance in this country of a flourishing human and cultural diversity alongside the inviolate values of democracy, the rule of law, civility, mutuality and respect.

Panel of judges solution another delay tactic

The interview with Bobby Brown, Community Matters supplement (CJN, July 30), would leave one with the impression that all is well on the conversion issue in Israel. Although Brown is optimistic in his views, the situation is far different than that described by him.

It is still quite clear that the Chief Rabbinate has declared that it will not participate in the conversions of graduates from the conversion institute thus making the entire enterprise somewhat worthless at best. Brown indicates that if, after two years, a flexible court has not been created, the government will take the initiative to create a panel of judges. The approach is nothing more than a continuation of the delay tactics that have informed the government's approach to this issue since it first arose in June 1997. Why should the liberal Jewish movements wait any longer for a concrete, sustainable solution to a serious problem confronting Jewish status in Israel?

In respect to the Kotel, Brown indicates that the government is looking at Robinson's Arch as a possible location for "alternate prayers." I assume by alternate that he means Conservative and Reform. Why should this be viewed as an alternate form of Jewish worship? Perhaps the government could consider moving the present separation of men and women to Robinson's Arch and "convert" the existing main prayer area for those movements that permit prayer by men and women together. After all, if the Kotel is considered one site, it should make no difference where along the Kotel Jews engage in their individual forms of worship.

No easy answer to child-parent problems

In the CJN (July 2), Guest Voice Sidura Ludwig wrote movingly of her frustration at witnessing a man (a father?) inflicting harsh pain on a small boy while she watched, trying haltingly to stand up for the child. As a mother of four children, I have often tried over 20 years to come to grips with injustices I have witnessed.

But the problem is even greater than you described and I'm afraid it's even harder to fix than you suggest. For example, what can we do when a parent simply abandons his or her family, perhaps leaving them in poverty?

Or what about the case where a spouse, after a divorce turns the children against the other parent so virulently that even years later, they still will not speak to him/her?

What about a parent who belittles, insults, and swears at his/her children constantly, and in public?

What can be done? Social workers have told me that they are busy already with cases that are much worse than the ones I've described. Yet our Jewish values tell us not to stand idly by while injustice is being done. (Cf. Lev. 19:16) On the other hand, sometimes action can do harm, too. Do we want to bring in the long arm of the law when someone's values are different than ours?

The only approach that seems a little helpful is talking about it, telling the stories, trying to understand what these children are going through, and trying to do a better job ourselves.

Police and soldiers in Israel also in danger

As a citizen of Toronto, I mourn the loss of Detective William Hancox and express my sympathy to his wife and family. To serve to protect the lives of others at the risk of one's own life is a noble undertaking. Without the dedication of such young men as Hancox, the citizens of this city could not enjoy the feelings of security and safety that make Toronto a unique, large, livable and safe metropolis.

The State of Israel must also look to the police and, in addition, to the soldiers of the IDF to safeguard its citizens. In Israel, tragically, many must make the supreme sacrifice, often leaving behind young widows and families while performing their duties.

Hopefully, the senseless killings throughout the world will someday cease and the guardians of society will go forth to work in the morning knowing that they will return safely in the evening to their loved ones.

I and thousands of mourners watched the funeral procession of Detective William Hancox on TV. We all had tears in our eyes resulting from the senseless loss of a bright, young, dedicated policeman fulfilling his duty.

To me this brings up a similar situation where all Jews should be concerned I refer to the daily loss taking place of young soldiers of Israel who are mostly in their teens. We should all think of the loss affecting their families and loved ones, while they defend not only Israel but all Jews the world over. I feel very sorry, as a person dedicated to Israel since the war of 1948 and as a person whose family has served faithfully for Canada in two world wars. I am disappointed by the fact that these brave soldiers are taken for granted by most Canadian Jews.

I am sorry that so much money is donated to science, art and universities, and yet so little is given to help ease the lives of the brave soldiers.

While we all give to UJA, the United Way and hospitals, it is important to remember that without the soldiers there would be no Israel.

Approaching my 92nd birthday, I will remember the soldiers in a most practical way by making a donation to their benefit. I hope that thousands of Jews will also feel the same way.

Stories teachers tell

By ALEX POMSON

"Rav Gershenson turned to the class. 'Can anyone explain the inyan?' he asked quietly.

"He was answered by silence.

"He sighed loudly. 'Nu,' he said, 'no one can explain it…The truth is, I cannot explain it myself. It is a difficult inyan. A very difficult inyan.' He was silent for a moment, then shook his head and smiled. 'A teacher can also sometimes not know,' he said softly.

"This was the first time in my life I had ever heard a rabbi admit that he didn't understand a passage of Talmud. We sat there in an uncomfortable silence. Rav Gershenson stared down at the open Talmud on his desk. Then he closed it slowly and dismissed the class."

In this passage from The Chosen, Chaim Potok offers what looks like a caricature of Jewish teaching. He describes a world where teachers are invariably male and all-knowing; where Talmud provides the quintessential subject matter; and where students sit in silent awe of scholars who, they assume, will provide answers to the most difficult questions.

If Potok's rendition of Jewish classroom life little resembles the world of Jewish schooling with which most of us are familiar, this excerpt nevertheless offers an excellent example of the ways in which the narrative form can convey the essence of teaching. It also makes us wonder what we might discover about teaching and learning in Jewish schools, if those who teach (or have taught) there, would also tell their stories.

Bar and bat mitzvah are considered one of the early focal points for Jewish education. In this 1869 painting by Moritz Oppenheim, we see a young man presenting his dvar Torah. His family, friends, and presumably his teacher are obviously enjoying it. [From Jewish Liturgy, Keter Publishing, 1975]

A team at York University has attempted to realize this ambition through an ongoing project where Jewish day school teachers from Canada and England compose year-long journals about their lives and work. Our quest to collect narratives written by Jewish educators was inspired by a growing body of research in which scholars have increasingly looked to teachers as sources of insight about teaching, using a variety of narrative forms to obtain a fresh perspective on pedagogy and on teachers' professional lives.

In the Jewish world, there are perhaps only two bodies of literature which may presently offer narratives of this sort, and for different reasons, these may either inspire or appal us. On the one hand, there is an ancient body of talmudic/midrashic writing that is rich with anecdotes and stories about students and teachers. On the other hand, there is a recent body of North American fiction in which characters reflect on the terrible impact of their own Jewish schooling. In this case, and on an almost epidemic scale, writers like Philip Roth and Mordecai Richler have offered accounts of Jews scarred or mesmerized by their Jewish education.

It is unfortunate that we do not possess accounts of Jewish teaching which are either more reliable or more recent than these, for it means that prospective or practising Jewish teachers lack a frame of reference within which to make sense of their work. It means that parents, when interacting with their children's teachers, may tend to rely on their own childhood memories of teaching rather than on more contemporary or mature sources of information about the nature of teaching and learning in Jewish day schools. It means also that Jewish community leaders, when making decisions about Jewish education, have almost certainly been deprived of the insights that teachers might bring to their deliberations.

In seeking to fill this vacuum, we have been fortunate to work with teachers from a variety of Jewish day schools, who have been prepared to commit themselves to a demanding journal-writing and interview process. Participants say their commitment comes as much from their appreciation of an opportunity to be taken seriously as from valuing the chance to record and reflect on their teaching year. The stories they tell are engaging, often personal and highly individual. They touch on themes that are part of the life and work of teachers but that also give expression to issues and questions at the heart of Jewish education.

Two journal extracts are presented here from last year's pilot project, in the hope that they may provide food for thought for parents and teachers as they contemplate the start of the school year. (The names of all the people involved have been changed.)

Story 1: How do our parents feel?

On Sept. 28, Leslie wrote: Parshat hashavuah is aimed so well at the Grade 4s. They can go beyond what's written, whether a law or a story, and see the abstract concepts. This week we discussed leadership, and what qualities would be needed in a leader who followed Moses. In realizing that the new leader also needed to lead in battle, we moved into the ethical/historical foundations of tribal/national movement, reasons for movement (i.e. hunger, religious persecution, overcrowding, "God tells you to").

From these, [we moved on] to the morality of war, other options for resolution, places where solutions have not been found, terrorism in Israel, suicide bombers, why someone would give their life for God, for a cause, for love.

One girl raised her hand at this point and said, "If my little brother [a baby half-brother] was in the path of a car, I would push him away and let the car hit me instead. I've been lucky to already have lived nine years, but he's hardly had a chance to live at all."

Profoundly moved by what she said, I said that's how I feel about my children. As the kids started to wonder aloud if that's how their parents feel, I closed the conversation, and suggested that it continue at home.

Story 2: Whose child?

In late March, Shifra wrote: A boy was pulled out of my class to go to another school because his younger sister was not being motivated at our school. It's really not fair to the brother, but the parents didn't want the sister to go alone. The boy had his friends. He was very happy here.

I bumped into the mother and she began telling me how inspirational I was and how the child keeps talking about me. Everything is "Morah Shifra said…" I felt that they did such an injustice to the child. He had such a thirst for knowledge in limudei kodesh and it was taken away because of a younger sibling.

Could the child call me at home ?

Yes, of course.

I can watch this decision and feel it is wrong, but can say nothing. He is their child and it is their right to do as they feel best for their children. Yet it hurts me. At first, I took it personally, until I was reassured by the mother that the decision was purely because of the younger sibling.

There are many ways of reading these stories, but in this context we will suggest simply how they may speak of special problems and possibilities that come from teaching Jewish studies in Jewish schools.

From Leslie's perspective as a progressive teacher in a non-Orthodox school, the centrality of Torah to Jewish self-understanding has made certain demands of her, encouraging her to explore deep questions that most teachers would rarely contemplate raising with 9-year-olds. It is as if she sees herself, like rabbis and teachers for thousands of years, as obligated to weave a fabric of enquiry which joins the weekly Torah portion to the lives of her students, even if this requires starting out from texts and questions far removed from the students' own interests.

There is something poignant about her way of gently moving students through a winding set of often tangential concerns, a process that bears a strong resemblance to the layered method of midrash, perhaps the oldest form of Torah teaching.

In telling this story, Leslie not only celebrates how the study of Torah is capable of moving young children to ask profound questions about their lives, she also shows how, through skilful mediation, traditional texts can shape the rhythm of weekly life in the classroom.

In many Orthodox Jewish homes, students are obliged to report to their parents each Sabbath on some aspect of the weekly Torah portion – on what answers they can give this week. Strikingly, students in Leslie's class choose to take home questions for which they still seek answers.

Shifra's story also speaks about the relationship between school and home, but this time with pain. In part, this comes from her own sense of failure, expressed when she first blames herself for the student's being withdrawn from the school. But her discomfort may also come from the pain of recognizing the limits of her own role. For, although the student here is one who has developed a thirst for what Shifra teaches, in the final analysis, he is only Shifra's student, not her child.

Shifra's influence only goes so far, even if in her judgment, the boy's parents do harm to their son. As a teacher – and perhaps unlike a doctor or lawyer – she feels unable to challenge the client's judgment. She can only make herself available in her own time, outside school.

In preliminary discussions about stories such as these, parents and teachers say the stories express some of the most problematic and profound aspects of parent-teacher relationships. Like all good stories, they seem to mean as much to those who hear them as to those who tell them. In this case, we could suggest that they certainly give new meaning to that old cliché about Jewish education being founded on a partnership between school and home.

Home away from home

In recent days, a well-established but relatively little-known program that brings Israelis into the lives of thousands of young Canadians and Americans each summer, has been wrapping up at dozens of places around North America. True to form, it has been a huge success although it is far too early to measure its full impact this year.

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Late August marks the culmination of a process that began last winter at a seminar retreat near Tel Aviv. Over the course of several sessions, some 2,500 applicants took part in a workshop where they were evaluated as possible Israeli shlichim (emissaries) to work at Jewish summer camps in Canada and the United States. By April, following a series of intensive seminars conducted by the Jewish Agency, 450 mostly young men and women were selected. By late June, all were in place at 110 camps scattered around the continent.

The program was launched in the late 1960s and at first involved only a few dozen Israelis. Today, 30 years later, it has expanded considerably with specially trained Israelis now playing a vital role at a growing number of Jewish-affiliated camps. Often the shlichim provide the first interaction and living link for campers with real, live Israelis.

The contingent that just completed its summer at Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont., is a vivid illustration of the program in action. This year, Ramah hired 15 Israelis. Together, their ethnic backgrounds and degree of observance perfectly reflect the diversity of Israel's Jewish population. Among the Israelis at Ramah were Ashkenazim and Sephardim, secular and religious. Some were from big cities, others from small towns and kibbutzim. The group included third generation native-born Israelis and new immigrants from Ethiopia, Russia and North America. Most were between the ages of 20 and 25 and had recently completed their army service. All exuded a strong sense of identification with and love of Israel.

It was a dynamic, committed group who contributed something only Israelis could give to a Jewish camp. I was proud to be part of this delegation along with my sabra wife.

The Ramah movement, with its strong Jewish and Zionist orientation, has long been a champion of bringing Israelis over to work on their staff. Proportionately, the seven Ramah overnight camps in North America employ more Israelis than any other camps.

"It's clear that as a camp whose major goal is Jewish growth, Israel plays a central role for us," says Rabbi Mitch Cohen, who, as director of Camp Ramah in Canada, usually travels to Israel every spring to help select the shlichim for the coming summer.

"The only way to make a real live connection for campers between their own lives and what it really means to live in Israel is to bring over Israelis. The fact that they perform good jobs as specialists at camp is just a small piece of it. More importantly, by living in the cabins with the kids, by going to all the activities with the kids, they infiltrate the lives of campers who get to know Israel as a human thing and not just as some distant concept."

The shlichim, who go through an intensive screening and training process in Israel, work in a vast array of jobs at the camps. This summer at Ramah, in addition to staffing the Hebrew and Judaism programs, Israelis taught krav maga (an Israeli-invented form of self-defence), cartooning, photography, folkdancing and cooking, worked in tripping, and edited the camp newspaper.

They were an integral part of the staff and played an important role in the daily life of camp. As much as they contributed to the atmosphere and activities of camp, they received a great deal in return.

"I learned so much," says Aviva Freedman, 20, who lives in Jerusalem. "Even though we were trained for it, this was a totally new experience for me. What I found amazing here was the variety of ways people practise their Judaism. It's not like in Israel where things are polarized between the Orthodox and the secular. I also learned to better appreciate that in Israel, the Jewish aspects of life are much more natural than in North America outside Camp Ramah. We can be ourselves as Jews more comfortably in Israel."

The Jewish Agency invests considerable resources in the selection and grooming of envoys. For the camps, it is not a casual undertaking as they are saddled with the extra costs of the each Israeli's training, visas, and travel. But the camps must feel it's worth it, as they keeping bringing over more Israelis each year. They're right.

Sharansky's Zionism

Since Natan Sharansky began to play a major political role in Israel, his image has gone through a number of ups and downs.

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In the 1996 elections, his party, Yisrael b'Aliyah, was far more successful than had been expected. As a result, Sharansky demanded and gained a cabinet seat as minister of commerce and industry.

In contrast to many of his colleagues, he was also able to work with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and despite his lack of political experience, the former Prisoner of Zion became a central figure in the government. He is responsible for foreign policy with respect to Russia, and is a member of the small "kitchen cabinet" involved in determining strategy for negotiations with the Palestinians.

However, as Netanyahu and his government became involved in scandals and was seen as indecisive and divided, Sharansky did not escape criticism. His party was riven by factionalism and personality disputes, and many analysts argued that he was not devoting enough time to the problems of the Ministry for Commerce and Industry.

Secular Israelis were angry when Sharansky did not use the large number of mixed marriages among Russian Jews to attack the official rabbinate, and the left expected a more conciliatory position with respect to the Palestinians, as a counter to hard-liners in the government.

Among the Israeli public, none of this criticism has stuck, and Sharansky is emerging as a new Zionist voice. This is most apparent in his demands that any Israeli agreement on territorial withdrawal in negotiations with the Palestinians must be preceded by a change in Palestinian behavior and rhetoric. In these talks, Sharansky is unwavering, insisting that the Palestinians first rewrite their charter, school books and other official documents to remove all the language that denies the legitimacy of Israel and Zionism.

Sharansky's position on this issue reflects his extraordinary personal experience and his total commitment to Zionism, as well as his understanding of the enemies of Israel. As a result of his own history in the Soviet Union, Sharansky knows that the language and signals sent by the Palestinian leadership, from Yasser Arafat down, still fundamentally reject the legitimacy of Zionism and Israel as a Jewish State. In debates with the American Jews in the U.S. State Department who are centrally involved in the negotiations, Sharansky displays the evidence that the Palestinian goal of eliminating the Jewish state has not changed. With increasing conviction, he argues that this, and not questions over land and other technical issues, is the main obstacle to peace. This position resonates with the views of a large number of ordinary Israelis, and along with his sharp sense of humor and his own modesty, it has contributed to Sharansky's political support across a wide section of society.

Perhaps more than anyone else alive during this 50th year of Israeli independence, Sharansky and his wife, Avital, have consistently dedicated themselves to the Zionist dream of Jewish independence and security. Like thousands of other Soviet Jews, Sharansky's views were formed by the events of 1967, when the Arabs prepared to reverse the results of the 1948 war, and to "push the Jews into the sea."

Joining the underground movement that worked to gain freedom for the three million Jews locked behind the Iron Curtain, he was dedicated to the goal of mass aliyah to Israel. For these actions, he was repeatedly interrogated by the KGB and spent many years in the prison camps in Siberia. In this crucible, his passion for Zionism and sharp insight into the dynamics of hatred and hostility not only endured but were strengthened.

Sharansky's background experiences led him to see what many other Israeli leaders and eager American (and Canadian) peace-makers have missed – that the key issue in the negotiations with the Palestinians is not the quantity of land to turn over or to hold, but rather, the quality of the peace. As an intense Zionist, Sharansky understands that until the leaders, from Arafat to the teachers and journalists, mount a sustained and intense campaign to tell the Palestinian masses that the Jewish state is a permanent and legitimate part of the Middle East, there will be no real peace for Israel.

This Zionist commitment is expressed in other areas as well – including Sharansky's efforts to define a middle and constructive role for religious law and the Chief Rabbinate, and the importance he places on the unity of the Jewish people. It is probably too early to discuss an even wider political role for Sharansky, and he currently lacks a wide party base to run for prime minister. However, it is clear that over the coming years, his importance and impact as a Zionist leader will increase.

It's time already

The matter of the Vatican's silence about its role in the Holocaust has taken yet another turn. When, some months ago, the Papal office issued a statement about the Holocaust that had elements of apology in it, many people greeted this development with the hope that more would follow and that the Holy See would at last own up to its terrible posture during the Nazi years. Unfortunately, this hope has not become reality, at least not yet.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The issue has once more become acute – and very quickly so – because the latest Vatican statement was recently attacked by Germany's greatest critic of Rome's activities in those crucial years. The person who again becomes the crucible of this unhappy situation is Rolf Hochhuth, whose play The Deputy (Der Stellvertreter) made him world famous when it opened in 1963. In it, none other than Pope Pius XII was at the centre of the production, which pictured a timid man who knew what was going on, yet made little attempt to do anything about it.

While in the intermediate years, Hochhuth said relatively little about the politics of the Vatican, he has now spoken out again. Not surprisingly, his voice commanded the German media and has revived the critique that his play had presented so effectively.

Since the secret archives of the Vatican have, at least in part, been made accessible to the public, they are indeed a sad commentary on the Pope's relative inactivity. To be sure, some Jews, and perhaps a significant number, were saved – the actual figures are in doubt and may exceed many thousands – the Pope's personal support of Hitler never wavered (at least not visibly), and several of his most influential bishops did very little to alleviate the mounting catastrophe.

As late as 1942, when the killing machine of the Nazis was operating at full blast, the Vatican saw fit to emphasize the Jewish guilt over the killing of Jesus and continued to pillory the Jews as a people who had committed "deicide." The newly accessible documents reveal that this particular reference was typed by the Pope himself on his personal typewriter.

And when the war was over at last, the Vatican facilitated the escape of many Nazi criminals to South America, where they lived out their miserable lives in security and never had to face the kind of retribution that justice would have demanded.

To be sure, all of it is now more than 50 years in the past, and much has happened. The Church has made a serious effort to look at itself, to seek rapprochement and mutual understanding with the Jewish people in many countries, including Canada, and also with Israel, but so far has not found the courage to state in forthright fashion, openly and courageously, that its activities were less than morally defensible in those days.

Nothing would help to put a final seal on this unhappy aspect of Jewish relationships with Rome as would this kind of declaration. Pope John Paul has now opened the door to such action, but his March declaration was clearly inadequate. It is not too late to make it right, and the time to do it is long overdue.

The Kirshner File

Small town American Jewry profiled

Sociological case studies of Jews in the United States have focused on major cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and Boston, even though smaller towns with less than 100,000 residents were the destination of one-quarter of all Jewish immigrants who settled in America.

By Sheldon Kirshner

In light of this fact, it is surprising that there has been so little published material about this second group. Ewa Morawska's book, Insecure Prosperity: Small-Town Jews in Industrial America, 1890-1940 (Princeton University Press), is one of those rare offerings. Her findings, one supposes, could also be applied to a Canadian setting.

In this illuminating volume, Morawska, a professor of sociology and history at the University of Pennsylvania, profiles the Jewish community of Johnstown, a steel town in the coal mining region of western Pennsylvania whose population hovered around the 50,000 mark between the turn of the century and the outbreak of World War 11.

Johnstown, 70 miles southeast of Pittsburgh, was established by an Anglo-Protestant elite, and as it grew it attracted additional immigrants from Western and Eastern Europe. By 1940, Johnstown had 340 Jewish households, comprising some 1,200 individuals.

The vast majority of Johnstown's Jews were from Eastern Europe, with a sprinkling from Germany. As Morawska points out, a significant proportion was related through blood or marriage, and 40 percent shared an identical surname.

Due to a combination of factors, principally poverty and restrictive housing covenants, the first Jewish settlers gravitated toward immigrant neighborhoods near the mills and the downtown area close to the railroad station.

The synagogue was the centre of organized Jewish life. By the mid-1920s, there were three shuls, two Orthodox (frequented by the Eastern Europeans) and one Reform (founded by German Jews). As well, the community was served by the usual array of organizations, clubs and societies.

A diligent researcher, Morawska discovered that 90 percent of the Jews were small traders. They did not work at local mills or mines, being considered unfit for arduous manual labor. In any event, Jews did not seek out this kind of employment.

Occupying a tightly-knit ethnic niche, Jews rarely socialized or forged personal friendships with Christians. Consequently, there were very few interfaith marriages. Morawska, herself the product of an intermarriage, claims that mixed marriages made up only 1.6 percent of weddings in the Jewish community prior to 1940.

In a reflection of their desire to be inconspicuous, Jews did not publicize United Jewish Appeal fund-raising campaigns, nor did they take part in Johntown's civic life. According to Morawska, their preoccupation with avoiding public attention sharpened their image as outsiders.

Nevertheless, over 80 percent of Jews voted for the conservative Republican party, whose socio-political ethos permeated Johnstown. Jews believed it was simply more expedient to be registered as Republicans. Johnstown's ruling class was Republican, and Jews felt they could better further their economic interests by identifying with the powers-that-be.

Despite their allegiance to Republican values, Jews were the butt of traditional prejudice, which existed in both the upper and lower strata of society. But, she hastens to add, Johnstown's was a subdued, non-vitriolic anti-Semitism.

In an epilogue on the Jewish community since the end of World War 11, Morawska divides its development into three separate periods: growth through the late 1950s; decline from the 1960s to the 1980s; and a limited revival in the past several years.

As a result of a fresh influx of East European Jews after the war, the size of the community nearly doubled. Jews began to participate in civic affairs, yet social relations between Jews and Christians remained very limited.

During the early 1960s, the local economy, dependent on outdated "smokestack industries," declined and the overall population decreased. Jews, of course, were affected by this process. The children and grandchildren of oldtimers who had rushed to colleges in the post-war era did not return, and a growing number of retirees left for Florida. By the late 1980s, no more than 415 Jewish men, women and children lived in Johnstown and environs.

Johnstown's prospects have brightened since the introduction of high-tech industry in the 1990s, but at the same time, the nature of the Jewish community has changed.

Third and fourth-generation American Jews from across the country have been drawn to Johnstown, and they work for mainstream U.S. companies rather than for Jewish small merchants.

These young professionals regularly participate in civic organizations, and they are welcome as members of country clubs. In other words, the Jews of Johnstown are far more integrated than in the past. They are secure rather than insecure about their place and status in local society.

Israel at Fifty pavilion is a feast for the eyes

In computer parlance, it is a virtual experience, almost like visiting Israel itself. The Israel at Fifty pavilion at the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto, which runs until Sept. 7, is a feast for the eyes and, in part, a reflection of Israel's diversity.

The pavilion, the largest such exhibit outside Israel, is an eclectic ensemble of archeology, culture, biology and current events, as well as a lively marketplace of Israeli food and products ranging from canned hot peppers to Scent of the Bible perfume.

Walking through the vast pavilion, I could not but think that Israel has come a tremendously long way since its tumultuous origins five decades ago.

The centrepiece is doubtless the fifth-century 45 feet by 13 feet Tzippori synagogue mosaic floor, which has been lovingly restored and reconstructed by the Israel Museum. It reminds us yet again that the Jewish people's connection with Israel transcends the ages. Toronto artist Dubi Arie's phantasmagoric mural, The Mission, which depicts the tragic and joyous sweep of Jewish history, lends further substance to this fact.

The Negev Desert display, replete with cascades of sand, bristling cactuses, feathery vegetation, beekeeper's boxes, reptiles and two camels from the Bowmanville Zoo, highlights a region which may be the key to Israel's future should it sign a final peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Being an exercise in public relations, the pavilion ignores the worrisome rifts in Israeli society and glosses over Israel's Arab minority, comprising 20 percent of its population. But, as you know, the voracious media fill in these gaps quite regularly.

Israel a technological power

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

In 1948, Israel had a population of some 650,000. By 1951, an additional 668,000 people had arrived. Given the country's struggle for survival and the urgency of providing for the most basic needs of a population that tripled over the course of a decade, it was hard to imagine that Israel would make significant economic or technological progress.

And yet, 50 years after its establishment, Israel has become an economic and technological powerhouse. It has the 21st highest per-capita GDP in the world. A recently published United Nations report ranked it 23rd worldwide in its standard of living, based on per capita income, life expectancy and educational standards. Much of this progress is due to innovations in applied sciences and technology.

Since the country was almost bereft of natural resources, special emphasis was placed, from the beginning, on the need for advanced education and scientific research. A number of top-level academic institutions were established by the Yishuv, the Jewish community in Palestine, even before Israel gained its independence. The first of these was the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, established in 1924. The Hebrew University of Jerusalem was inaugurated in 1925 and the Weizmann Institute of Science, which came into being in 1946, had its origins in the Sieff Institute, founded in 1934.

Even before these academic institutions were formed, the Jewish community was already conducting agricultural research at the Mikveh Israel School (established in 1870), and at the Agricultural Station (set up in Tel Aviv in 1921), which later became the Agricultural Research Organization. The British mandatory government had also established public research institutes and government institutions that boosted scientific development.

In fact, the combination of the educational and scientific infrastructure with the country's most pressing problems unexpectedly made for a creative synthesis which set development in motion.

Today, the country is enjoying a blossoming of high-tech entrepreneurship rivaling that in the most developed countries in the world. Agricultural innovations aimed at producing food for a rapidly growing population have included drip irrigation, agromechanical equipment, and more recently, the use of plant genetics to produce better-yielding and more disease-resistant crops.

In Israel, research and development is now carried out primarily at the universities. Today, 105,000 students are enrolled in Israel's universities, with about 21 percent of all undergraduate students and 50 percent of all PhD candidates specializing in the sciences or medicine.

Relative to the size of its labor force, Israel has a significantly larger number of publishing authors in the natural sciences, engineering, agriculture and medicine than any other country, and this also represents a significant degree of international scientific cooperation.

Research and development also takes place in industry; in fact, studies have shown that R&D-intensive companies have been a major source of growth in industrial employment and exports. Today, Israel boasts 1,800 R&D-based companies, including many new start-ups and software houses, which account for more than half the country's $20 billion in exports.

Since Israel achieved independence in 1948, scientific research and technological innovations have been key factors in shaping the country into a modern state able to meet the challenges of development in the face of scarce natural resources.

Chassidism on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Three hundred years ago, a rabbi was born whose followers would ultimately change the face of Judaism. The founder of the chassidic movement, Rabbi Israel Ben Eliezer (the Baal Shem Tov) was born on the 18th of Elul, 5458 (1698).

Born in extreme poverty, Chassidism has evolved into several sophisticated worldwide movements that make full use of the Internet and related technologies to get their message across.

Chassidic groups have developed everything from computerized Jewish libraries to on-line music to a service where kvittels (letters of Divine request) can be e-mailed to Jerusalem to be deposited at the Western Wall. While some chassidic groups have been quick to embrace new technologies in order to spread their message, others have been more reticent. However, we'll see that the power of the Web is so irresistible, even one traditionally insular chassidic group has decided to set up its own "unofficial" Web site.

Through the teachings of the Baal Shem Tov, Chassidism traditionally emphasized the priority of emotion over intellect, the ability of everyone to experience God's presence and the importance of joy.

Eliezer Siegel does a good job summing up the roots of chassidic beliefs [http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/363_Transp/Orthodoxy/Hasidism.html] as does the TimeLine of Jewish History [http://www.jewishamerica.com/TimeLine/chassidi.htm].

At the same time, the Misnagdim under the Ga'on of Vilna opposed abandoning traditional Jewish scholarship. Sometimes you need a guide map to help you sort through all the varieties of Chassidim and Misnagdim. In order to get your bearings, Eliezer Segal has prepared a road map of the various strains of Orthodox Judaism along with explanations of their beliefs, views about other Jews and political relationship to the State of Israel [http://acs6.acs.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/363_Transp/08_Orthodoxy.html#Map].

Central, of course, to all Chassidim is reverence of their Rebbe and the many stories told and retold about his remarkable personality. I'll devote a future column to those stories.

For more on Chassidim, take a look at Links prepared by Digital Genizah [http://uscj.org/metny/middletown/hasid.htm#CHASIDS] or by Michael Graffam [http://www1.mhv.net/~mgraffam/rel/hasidism/hasidism.html]. And if you want to actively study the teachings of the Baal Shem Tov, you can join the Chassidus list [http://www.contrib.andrew.cmu.edu/usr/kb4m/info.htm]. Every week four or five short teachings from the Baal Shem Tov and other chassidic masters will be e-mailed to you. The focus of the list: "Love of God, Love of his fellow Jew, and Love of the Torah."

Finally, to get an excellent feel for chassidic belief, I highly recommend How and Why Hasidim Pray by Rabbi Harold Schulweis of Valley Beth Shalom of Encino, Calif., [http://www.vbs.org/rabbi/hshulw/hasspray.htm].

Rabbi Schulweis says that even non-Chassidim have much to learn and emulate from Chassidim, particularly from the chassidic struggle against mechanical study and prayer. He retells the following anecdote: "I have gone through the Shas (Gemarah) six times already," the young talmudic scholar boasted. The Rebbe asked him, "And how many times has the Shas gone through you?"

Next week, more on Chassidim on the Web.

Kazin's last book explored authors' ideas of God

Books

By Bernard Baskin

God and the American Writer*, by Alfred Kazin (Random House, $35)

As both writer and personality, Alfred Kazin was impressive. I deeply lament his recent passing. He died on his 83rd birthday in his cluttered West Side Manhattan apartment.

In 1942, when he was only 27, Kazin wrote his interpretation of modern American prose literature, entitled On Native Grounds. It was widely praised for its fresh and incisive evaluation of writers from William Dean Howells to William Faulkner. The book's success transformed his life. In short order, he became editor of the New Republic and was welcomed into intellectual circles. During his long and busy career as teacher, lecturer and author he produced 13 works of non-fiction and 10 literary collections.

Memorable among his writings were his autobiographical reminiscences: A Walker in the City (1955), Starting out in the Thirties (1966), and New York Jew (1978).

He was born in the largely Yiddish-speaking ghetto of Brownsville, Brooklyn, the son of poor uneducated immigrants from czarist Russia. He wrote: "Every time I go back to Brownsville, it is as if I had never been away. From the moment I step off the train at Rockaway Avenue and smell the leak out of the men's room, then the pickles from the stand just below the subway steps, an instant rage comes over me, mixed with dread and some unexpected tenderness. As I walk those familiarly choked streets at dusk and see the old women sitting in front of the tenements, past and present become each other's faces; I am back where I began."

Always concerned with aspects of Jewish culture, he was ambiguous about Judaism. A decade ago in a revealing essay, he confided, "In the last few years I've discovered – and this is the simple fact – that nothing has as much emotional and spiritual value for me as the Jewish experience. I can't explain why. If anyone would say to me, 'Well, what is your position on the following?' I would have to answer: 'I do not go to synagogue. I have not sat up all night reading Hebrew. My body will be cremated. Yet, I have and have always had some kind of religious impulse.'"

Unlike some of his fellow critics who engaged in high-flown rhetoric and elliptical literary theories, Kazin wrote for the general reader. Like Edmund Wilson, the critic he most admired, his aim was always to communicate the manifold pleasures to be found in reading.

In God and the American Writer, Kazin,with his unfailing stylistic verve and penetration, examines the life and work of such American literary figures as Hawthorne, Melville, Emerson, Whitman, Dickinson, Eliot, Frost, and Faulkner. He gives a profound sense of each, and his quotations from their works are deftly chosen to illuminate what the idea of God means to them, as indicated in their writings.

Once, in a lecture to a college audience he admired the poetry of T.S. Eliot. He was reproached, "How can you admire such an enemy of the Jewish people?" Kazin responded with one of the most chilling sentences I have ever read, "If I had to exclude anti-Semites I would have little enough to read."

A centrepiece of the book is an analysis of writings at a time of the Civil War, including Lincoln's astonishing second inaugural address, and its reflections on divine providence. Kazin writes: "The triumphant North needed proof of its saintliness, and found it in the consecration of Abraham Lincoln. The Lincoln who never joined the Church became the god of a godless religion. Under the smug Republican administration of Calvin Coolidge, a great temple in Washington was built around a statue of Lincoln seated on a throne. Now the people truly had someone eternally to worship."

When Herman Melville visited the Holy Land in 1856, he was disappointed that the scriptural places provided nothing of the spiritual uplift he had expected: "Jerusalem, January 1857 – a village of lepers, their houses facing the wall, their park a dung-heap. They sit by the gates asking alms – their whine – avoidance of them and horror… The Church of the Holy Sepulchre amounts to broken dome, dingy, queer smell."

Fifty-five years after the appearance of On Native Grounds, the author has left his sorrowing readers a new understanding of a group of classic American authors and their ideas and opinions on a subject of enduring interest.

Couple find new home in 'Russian Town'

By MILA KLETSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Bathurst and Steeles area of Toronto is the heart of "Russian Town," which has a population of over 40,000.

A number of generations of "Russians" reside here. One can see grey haired couples walking down the road with small children who are their great-grandchildren, or baby boomers playing tennis with their 20 year-old "kids." They speak Russian; their kids answer them in English. They feel they are Canadians more than Russians.

One can hear many amazing life stories in this town of people who transformed their lives, raising kids and gradually creating this Russian town. For example, three generations of the Perlamutrovs, or as they now call themselves, Perlovs, live in the Russian Town.

Eva and Simon Perlamutrov have been together for 56 years. They left their native Odessa 22 years ago. Though any "Odessit" will share with you how difficult it is to leave the "best city in the world," they did it and found a new life here in Canada, different from their expectations, but happy and interesting nonetheless.

As a young man, Perlamutrov, a veteran of World War II, dreamed of becoming a lawyer. But he would never agree to be a member of the Communist party, which was the passkey to a law career at that time in the U.S.S.R. Thus, he was obliged to change his plans. Instead of attending the law school at Odessa University, he went to the university's history department, expecting that nothing could ruin his future as a teacher of history. Unfortunately he was wrong.

There was no job for Perlamutrov as a teacher and he had to find other work. Hiding his diploma "until better times," which never came for him as a teacher, he found a job as an auto mechanic.

Years later, in his 50s, the Perlamutrovs made the important decision to leave for Canada. Here Simon was hired for an entry level position at Shopsy's, the sausage maker. Before starting his job, he went back to school to "fight" the battle of learning English. He won that battle and started his new Canadian life.

His wife, who had been a doctor in Odessa, could not get certification to practise medicine here, and Perlamutrov felt additional pressure as the sole supporter of his family in their new country.

He was quickly promoted to the position of assistant to the supervisor and 10 years later, he retired from Shopsy's to start a new "working life."

Eva and Simon Perlamutrov

He divided his time in three volunteer jobs: offering his service to the Jewish community; working in the Association of Soviet Jewry; and assisting his son's family to raise his grandson Paul.

His son Fred and daughter-in-law Isabella had to devote much of their time to their jobs, Fred as an engineer, Isabella as an accountant in an insurance company.

"So, how could I enjoy my "free time, when my grandson Paul needed my care?" Perlamutrov wondered.

As the years passed, Paul graduated from high school and from the Royal Conservatory of Music. But then he decided to become a doctor, and he is now doing a residency in Montreal, although classical music is a passion for him, as it is for all of the Perlamutrov family.

Some years ago, Simon Perlamutrov started a furniture bank. It was a simple idea: get good furniture and appliances from people who do not need them anymore and offer them free to new immigrants. The concept proved successful and many people have been helped through the furniture bank.

Now another project occupies Perlamutrov. He, along with Sander Kovarsky and other Jewish Soviet veterans from World War II, all members of the Association of Soviet Jewry, are trying to bring to fulfilment the dream of establishing a museum of Soviet Jewish military glory, based on unique documents and materials in their possession.

"We want to demonstrate how courageous and strong the Jews were, to show that we were worthy to be the descendants of the Maccabees," Perlamutrov explained.

He wants to tell the world about the Jewish military contribution to the victory over the Nazis, to show that Jews not only were victims, but also resisted the Nazis. In this way, he hopes to encourage future generations of Jews to be strong and proud.

U of T scholar captivated by Leo Strauss' work

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leo Strauss is one of the finest Jewish philosophers of our time, yet even in academic circles he remains an obscure figure.

"He's very difficult," Kenneth Hart Green concedes. "He makes people work hard at what he's saying."

Green, an associate professor of modern Jewish religious thought at the University of Toronto, should know. He is one of the world's leading authorities on Strauss (1899-1973), a German Jew who was also a first-rate political thinker.

Since being drawn to Strauss by one of his mentors, the former University of Toronto philosopher Emil Fackenheim, Green, 45, has produced a substantial body of work about him.

Five years ago, he wrote Jew and Philosopher: The Return of Maimonides in the Jewish Thought of Leo Strauss. In 1997, he edited a volume of Strauss' essays, Jewish Philosophy and the Crisis of Modernity. More recently, he has prepared for publication the first of five volumes entitled The Jewish Writings of Leo Strauss.

"Strauss speaks to me as a Jew and as a person interested in philosophy," explained Green, who received his undergraduate degree from the University of Toronto and his post-graduate degrees from Brandeis University. "His writings exert a magnetic hold on me."

The issues which Strauss minutely examined, and which keenly engage Green today, turn on a basic question: How can one be a Jew in a modern society? Beyond that, Strauss grappled with such interrelated matters as the meaning of the Holocaust and the importance of Israel.

Strauss, whose interests generally ranged from the origins of modern Judaism to the philosophic underpinnings of Baruch Spinoza, was born in Kirchhain, in Hesse, and raised in an Orthodox Jewish environment.

Eventually, he drifted away from his parents' Orthodoxy, and "Strauss began to define himself as one of 'those (modern Jews) who cannot be Orthodox, but who must remain loyal to Judaism," Green writes.

After World War I, Strauss studied philosophy, history, mathematics and the natural sciences at several German universities. For two years, he taught at the Free Jewish House of Learning in Frankfurt. Subsequently, the Academy for the Science of Judaism in Berlin appointed him as a research fellow, a job he held until 1932.

While working there, he finished his first important book, Spinoza's Critique of Religion, and worked on a series of volumes on Moses Mendelssohn.

Leaving Germany less than a year before Hitler's assumption of power, Strauss became an itinerant scholar in France and England, where he researched the medieval philosophy of Moses Maimonides, as well as the political philosophy of Thomas Hobbes.

In 1938, the year of Kristallnacht, Strauss immigrated to the United States, taking up a position as a lecturer in philosophy at the New School for Social Research in New York City. Then, from 1949 until 1968, he taught at the University of Chicago's political science department.

Strauss, who considered political Zionism a moral force in modern Jewish history, was a visiting professor at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1954 and 1955.

Apart from his writings about Strauss, Green – who considers himself a "traditional" Jew – teaches two courses about him at the University of Toronto's Centre for the Study of Religion.

Born in Toronto, Green was raised in a Reform household, the son of Patrick, a businessman, and Freda, a library technician. The Greens had three boys, two of whom are medical doctors, and they encouraged them to appreciate the values of ideas. The lively debates in their home whetted Green's appetite for intellectual inquiry.

Kenneth Green

At one point, he contemplated the notion of becoming a rabbi, but the pull of academe was irresistible. "I found that a life devoted to teaching Judaism at the university level allowed me to have a greater impact," he said. "Introducing students to the fundamentals of Judaism and hoping it shapes their lives is like a rabbinic calling."

Green, who is married to Sharon Minitz, a part-time University of Toronto lecturer in Hebrew and Yiddish literature, passionately believes in the power of Jewish studies as a vehicle both for strengthening Judaism and for combatting assimilation and intermarriage.

"No one goes away from these courses less of a Jew," said Green, a member of Thornhill's Beth Avraham Yoseph. "Knowledge is the key to turning around intermarriage and assimilation. We have such a rich tradition, with so much wisdom. When people are exposed to Judaism in a positive way, it changes their lives."

Given his views, Green is troubled by the acrimonious culture war which has widened the chasm between religious and secular Jews in Israel.

Jewish unity, he said, should take precedence over all such quarrels. "Jews who don't see that are deceiving themselves." Yet Green has no illusions, realizing that Israelis have still not learned to respect each other's beliefs. "Israel, in the long haul, can't survive unless these issues are addressed and resolved," he warned.

Believing that the differences which currently divide Israelis will ultimately diminish, he draws hope from bridge builders like Rabbi David Hartman, Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, the leadership of Bar-Ilan University and secularist humanists like Hebrew University political scientist Dan Avnon.

Green claims that Orthodoxy cannot be blamed for a monster like Yigal Amir, the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin. "Amir represents a certain kind of error in contemporary Jewish thinking, not restricted to Orthodoxy, which confuses the messianic idea with the rebirth of Jewish independence and statehood."

The father of three children, Green is upbeat about the future of Judaism in North America. "I expect modern Orthodoxy, and traditional varieties of Reform and Conservative Judaism, to grow. People feel a greater need for religious roots, faith and discipline. There is a certain kind of disillusionment with secularism."

It is his credo that a Jew can be traditional and open to the world. "The two," he said, " are not mutually exclusive."

Bertha Dermer was president of Toronto Women's ORT

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bertha Dermer's life motto, which hung on her kitchen wall for some 30 years, was a quotation from Cicero: "Live each day as though you are going to die tomorrow; learn each day as though you are going to live forever."

The longtime community volunteer, who founded the Toronto chapter of the Dysautonomia Foundation and was a president of Toronto Women's ORT, died recently at age 83 of liver failure due to Hepatitis C.

Among her other involvements were the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and Israel Bonds.

Her daughter Alicia, speaking by phone from her home in New Jersey, recalled hearing people comment many times, "Bertha, you're doing too much."

"Life is short," her mother used to say. "If you're going to do something, you've got to spend the time and do it."

Obituary

Bertha was born in a town called Vielna in Buchovina, a province that was then part of Austria and is now part of Russia.

The eldest of three sisters, she was raised in Chernovitz, Romania, where she studied languages at the University of Chernovitz in the late 1930s, paying her own way by tutoring.

A brief pre-war marriage ended when her husband was taken to a labor camp, never to be heard from again.

Bertha spent four years in a concentration camp in Transnistria before resuming university studies, this time in medicine at the University of Vienna.

"It was unusual for a woman in her circumstances," noted her daughter.

She left her medical studies after two years to marry Angel Dermer, a second cousin who had written her from Colombia on learning she had survived the war.

Angel had established a dental laboratory in Bogota and Bertha worked with him, learning to design removable bridges for dentures and helping him build a country-wide chain of labs.

Their son Ricardo was born in 1951, and Alicia two years later. Ricardo was diagnosed with familial dysautonomia, a rare genetic disorder that affects the autonomic nervous system.

Symptoms of the disorder, also known as Riley-Day Syndrome, include high fevers, repeated vomiting attacks, stunted growth, fragile bones and inability to suck or swallow.

In 1981, Bertha became involved in one of her most personally satisfying charitable endeavors, founding the Toronto chapter of the Dysautonomia Foundation to raise awareness and funds for medical research.

Longtime community volunteer

Because of the political situation in Colombia, the Dermers immigrated to Toronto in 1962 to join Bertha's father, stepmother and youngest sister. They joined Temple Sinai and Bertha became involved in volunteer organizations like Hadassah-WIZO and ORT.

Although she continued to work with her husband and spent much time taking care of her son, Bertha "seemed to have just blossomed when she came to Canada," said Alicia.

At Alicia's urging, she returned to school, graduating in 1977 with a BA in languages from the University of Toronto at the same time Alicia received her MD.

"She had this constant drive. She was going all day, and could be doing three things at once," recalled Alicia. Angel referred to her by the Spanish word terremoto, which means earthquake.

"She really was an amazing person," said Alicia.

In addition to her daughter and husband, Dermer leaves two grandchildren, and sisters Clara Engel and Josefa (Pepi) Epstein. Her son Ricardo predeceased her in 1991.

New shaliach will hit road to small communities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bezalel Ben-Eliahu knows what it means to be an Israeli on the receiving end of donations from Diaspora Jews. He'll be here until the end of the year as a shaliach for the organization that is the conduit for such funds.

The native Quebecer, who began a five-month stint with UIA Federations on Aug. 1, made aliyah in 1957 and settled four years later on a moshav near Afula in "a totally new and previously unsettled area.

"All the funding for the building of our village and our homes and our farms was a direct contribution from the world Jewish community."

Now based in the Toronto office of UIA Federations, Ben-Eliahu, a 61-year-old father of five and grandfather of four, will be working with about two dozen non-federated communities in Ontario and the Maritimes, including Kitchener-Waterloo and Halifax.

He will travel from community to community "to explain the role of UIA in helping Jews around the world," he said.

Bezalel Ben-Eliahu

UIA Federations is the conduit through which United Jewish Appeal and Combined Jewish Appeal dollars earmarked for international use are routed. Most funds go to the Jewish Agency in Israel, which operates rescue and settlement programs for Jews making aliyah.

Ben-Eliahu feels it's also important to help Jewish leaders in small communities pass on Jewish values to their children by bringing programming related to tzedakah and Jewish life.

As an example of the role UIA plays internationally, Ben-Eliahu noted that the Joint Distribution Committee provides food parcels to the Jewish elderly in the former Soviet Union.

In Israel, he said, funds are also needed. "There's a concept that Israel is rich and doesn't need us any more."

That is a misconception, he said. Many Israelis are struggling newcomers whose lifestyle is "little more than basic survival," he emphasized.

Moshav Ram-On, where Ben-Eliahu owns a sheep farm, "is quite well developed... we have almost paid back all our loans. We've seen the prospering of our village, [but] when we look back to the beginning, it's very clear that without this assistance, we would never be where we are today."

Unlike most of his fellow alumni of Montreal's Jewish People's School and the Jewish People's High School, Ben-Eliahu has strong rural roots. His grandparents had emigrated from Russia "for ideological reasons, to be farmers. They felt it was important for a certain number of people to work the land."

Ben-Eliahu was raised on a farm in rural Quebec, and attended a one-room school until he was about 10 years old. His parents then moved to another farm, this one closer to Montreal in Ste-Sophie, and he commuted two hours each way to school.

The experience "opened a window to a different perspective of Jewish life," Ben-Eliahu recalled. "I became more and more convinced that you could live a Jewish life anywhere, but the fullest Jewish life could only be lived in Israel."

Ben-Eliahu spent time in Canada on several occasions during the '60s and '70s, serving as director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, as executive director of the Jewish National Fund in the Maritimes, as shaliach to Habonim youth movement in Vancouver and as assistant director of the Vancouver Jewish Community Centre.

Former OISE director prepares for new challenge

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — After a career in academia stretching back to the late 1950s, it could be time for Arthur Kruger to kick back and enjoy his retirement.

With a resume full of scholarly and administrative accomplishments, most would say the 65-year-old former director of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) and longtime community volunteer has earned it.

Instead, the father of four and grandfather of 11 is planning the next phase of his career: in September, he becomes vice-president of professional and graduate programs at New York-based Touro College.

His friend Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz – who has stayed with Kruger and his family over the years when in Toronto – once told him "we wish that people live to 120, but rarely do people live to 120…[the idea] is that you should assume at 70 that you have fifty years to live," says Kruger.

"You should always have the attitude that it's never too late to start a new career, a new anything," he says. "Just because you reach the magic age of 65 doesn't mean you should retire…if you have something to give, you should give."

An economist with a PhD from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and a specialist in industrial relations, Kruger has been working as a labor arbitrator since his retirement from OISE in 1995. After OISE's almagamation with the University of Toronto's (U of T) education faculty, OISE required an academic dean of education rather than an administrator, he said.

He'd been an arbitrator part time since the early 1970s and "at a certain point, you're not learning much new," he says.

But, he says,"[the Touro appointment] was something I was not looking for. I was not in the market for a job.

"I was doing arbitration and that was keeping me busy, but my real love was being around universities," the former U of T Faculty of Arts and Science dean says.

He couldn't pass up the opportunity at Touro and accepted just before Pesach, having been recommended by his son, Rabbi Yaacov Kruger, to Touro president and founder Dr. Bernard Lander.

The 25 year-old private university has 9,000 students – about 75 percent are Jewish – spread among seven campuses: four in New York (including Harlem and Spanish Harlem); two in Moscow and Israel for business and Jewish studies; and a medical school in San Francisco.

Of those, about 6,000 are "under my jurisdiction" Kruger says, "and that is going to grow."

Its master's program in Jewish studies is "one of the best" in Israel, Kruger says. With about 300 students, it's also the biggest, "bigger than Hebrew U, Tel Aviv, Bar-Ilan and Haifa combined – much bigger," he says.

He will also oversee Touro's law, medical and health sciences programs.

It's a large responsibility, but "I'm not coming with any preconceived notions of what I'll be doing," Kruger says, adding he'll take about "six months to a year taking a good hard look at what they're doing before developing a program of action.

"Someone has to come in there and see the broad picture, to work with existing deans to develop new programs," he says.

As a side benefit, the job will take him to Israel "quite often – [it's] one of the attractions of working for Touro," which means he'll get to see two of his four children, his son and a daughter, who are based in Israel.

In addition to his academic career, Kruger has a long interest in Jewish continuity and education. He is a life member of the Associated Hebrew Schools and former board member at Ulpanat Orot Girls' school and Or Chaim Yeshiva, as well as the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Continuity requires "good intensive Jewish education," Kruger says, and he's particularly enthusiastic about Jewish camping and campus services.

Kruger says more money is needed for camps with "a strong Judaic atmosphere…that permeates all aspects of the camp," and which observe Shabbat "whether in a Reform way, a Conservative way or an Orthodox way."

Subsidies would allow "a large percentage of Jewish kids [to] attend these camps, instead of 'Camp Yuppie,' where maybe they serve a piece of challah Friday night."

The former Jewish Campus Services president – from September 1996 to January 1998 – also feels "the campus is a neglected area in Ontario, and in Toronto in particular."

Comparing community spending on Toronto's approximately 10-12,000 Jewish students at Ryerson, York University and U of T to spending on the University of British Columbia's 1,200 Jewish students, Kruger says the Vancouver community commits "more than Toronto is spending – total, never mind per capita.

"The resources that the community has pumped [into Toronto campus services] are pathetic," Kruger says. "It's the last opportunity you have to work with young people when they're together. After that, they're dispersed [and] it's much harder to work with them."

His interest in Jewish continuity attracted him to Touro, which requires its Jewish students – such as those studying business at its Moscow campus – to take Jewish studies credits to graduate from secular programs.

Once they find housing, Kruger and wife Betty will leave for New York City. Their house is sold, but "I can't work in New York out of Toronto…until I find something there I'm not moving," he says.

"Some people think we are crazy and some people think we're taking a great new challenge in life – it depends on who you talk to," Kruger jokes.

"Lots of times, I think we are crazy."

Mayor's invitation brings survivor back

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust survivor Israel (Irving) Gold went back to Germany last month, closing a horrific chapter in his life.

Gold returned to the Landsberg concentration camp where he had been a forced laborer from Aug. 1944 to April 1945.

Fifty-three years on, he revisited the camp, near the town of Landsberg, as a guest rather than as a prisoner.

He and his wife, Faye, were invited to Landsberg by the mayor, Franz Xaver Russel. The Golds spent about a week in this region of southern Germany, grappling with bitter memories but glad to be alive as witnesses to a brutal era.

Their host was Michael Streicher, a local farmer whose late parents, Ludwig and Veronika, gave Gold shelter after he was liberated.

Gold, a retired dress cutter who immigrated to Canada in 1948, was originally invited to Germany in 1995 for the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Landsberg concentration camp, but due to ill health he was unable to go.

The invitation was a function of the town's desire to come to terms with Germany's Nazi past.

"[We] would like to contribute towards keeping the memory of this dark chapter of our history alive," the mayor wrote three years ago. "...we feel it is important that the eyes of the generation born after the downfall of Nazi Germany are opened to the atrocities which human beings are capable of.

"Although this generation is innocent, it is not free from the responsibility of learning from what happened...Injustice and crime must not be allowed to be forgotten."

Born in Lodz, Poland, Gold was a teenager when the German occupying force established a ghetto there. His father, Baruch, died of hunger in 1941. Later, he and his family were sent to Auschwitz.

"As we arrived in Auschwitz, I was chosen to work, while my mother Gitel and my brother Shmuel were shunted off to the gas chamber," he said.

In August 1944, Gold was sent to Germany through Dachau to the Landsberg concentration camp. He remained there until April 28, 1945, when it was freed by Allied soldiers.

Liberated at last, he was almost killed when American aircraft bombed the train he was on. Leaving the wreckage, Gold and a group of Jewish survivors walked to the village of Petzenhausen. Had he gone to a neighboring village like some of the other survivors, he would have been shot by the SS.

Instead, Gold spent the next three months in the home of the Streichers. "He and his family treated me very well, and for this I will always be grateful," he said.

Subsequently, Gold was transferred to a displaced persons camp in Landsberg, where he remained until 1948. He met his wife, also a Polish Jew and a survivor, in Toronto. They were married in 1952. They have one son and three daughters, as well as five grandsons and two granddaughters.

Upon arriving in Munich last month, the Golds were picked up at the airport by the mayor's chauffeur, and driven to the home of Michael Streicher, whose parents died about 20 years ago.

During their visit, the Golds were busy from morning to night.

They were shown former concentration camps and monuments denoting the mass graves of Jews who had perished there.

The mayor received them at city hall and gave them an extensive briefing of Landsberg's history during the Third Reich.

They were also given a tour of the prison where Adolf Hitler had written Mein Kampf in 1924.

And finally, they were taken to a concrete bunker where Gold had toiled under difficult conditions.

Israel Gold

"It wasn't easy to go back to Germany," conceded Gold, who harbors no animosity against the post-war generations of Germans. "We didn't know what was waiting for us. But I'm pleased I went."

The trip, he said in closing, brought relief and closure.

Weinryb plans her programs around nostalgia

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

Judy Weinryb

TORONTO — To Judy Weinryb, seniors' coordinator at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), seniors' memories are more than just simple stories.

"A lot of my programs revolve around nostalgia. We might watch an old Yiddish film, talk about Toronto as it used to be or reminisce about the CNE. People learn from each other's stories and talking about them makes them feel less isolated," says Weinryb.

Seniors always like to look back and remember, she says. "It's a positive experience. By talking or writing about their immigrant or Holocaust experience, or about what they did before the war, they are validating their memories. They become closer to the other people in the group," Weinryb says.

A graduate of Wurzweiler School of Social Work at Yeshiva University, she has worked primarily with seniors since returning to Toronto in 1983. She has written a volunteer manual for the Second Mile Club, run a couples club at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, and worked as a social worker at Baycrest Day Care Service and Ahavath Achim Day program for frail seniors.

She has been at the JCC since 1995.

"When I work with seniors, I learn from the richness of their experiences," Weinryb says. "There is a lot of wisdom packed into their memories."

Not everything at the weekly group, however, revolves around memories, she says. "We've visited the Bata Shoe Museum, gone to the ballet, and hosted lectures by various professionals. Jewish content is an important aspect of the programming, and as well, classes are held in fitness and in crafts such as knitting or pottery."

Although her primary function is to plan programming, Weinryb depends heavily on input from program participants. "I facilitate the planning process and involve them heavily in it. We have a reciprocal relationship," she says."

She also feels it is important to create a social atmosphere where the seniors feel comfortable. "I want them to have a warm, special relationship with the others and with me. Seniors have limitless amounts to offer. They should be respected and be given the opportunities to learn. I want them to ask and be heard."

People from all backgrounds attend her seniors' group, but Weinryb's main goal is to serve the people in the downtown Jewish community.

"I'm trying to create links. Last year, we made shalach manot with University of Toronto students and delivered them to housebound seniors. We've also had intergenerational programs in which people have read stories and reminiscences over afternoon tea.

"I have people in the group who live on Major Street or Baldwin Street, or in the area around Honest Ed's, and a lot of these people are in their original homes. We bring people together and help them form their own downtown Jewish community. I am trying to reach the isolated elderly who may be unaware of our program."

A tremendous bond has developed among the people in the group, she says. "People see it as their second home."

Catholic magazine slams Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A small Catholic magazine has unleashed a vicious attack on Israel.

A recent issue of the Toronto-based monthly, Catholic Insight, says the Jewish state, "as it stands now, will not and should not endure. It will not endure because Palestinians cannot be repressed forever. It should not endure because a secular state is no answer to a religious quest."

The magazine's editor, Father Alphonse de Valk, in an article titled "Israel at 50," says Israel "has become a Bismarckian-Machiavellian power state which maintains itself through blood and steel."

In Israel, the article continues, "Arabs – whether Muslim or Christian – hold second-rate citizenship, while their cousins in the occupied lands have practically no rights at all."

The article, which also accuses Jews of "ethnic cleansing" following their 1948 victory in the War of Independence, says Israel "must cease to ignore the greatest Jew of all time – compared to whom all other illustrious Jewish names appear pathetically puny – Jesus, the anointed."

The magazine has a circulation of about 3,200. Father de Valk, a priest with the Basilian order, told The CJN.

He defended the article, saying that at no time did he question Israel's right to exist.

Israel 'should not endure'

But, he added, Israel, a "power state, uses all means and all tools to repress part of its citizenry. It cannot survive unless it wants to oppress Arabs forever."

The editorial brought a brusque letter from Toronto Jewish activist Bert Raphael, who condemned it as an "anti-Semitic and anti-Israel piece of bigotry.

"I guess in your list of puny Jews, you would include Abraham, Jacob and Moses, David Ben-Gurion and Yitzhak Rabin," Raphael wrote to the magazine.

Father de Valk said he "did not have the Old Testament in mind" when he used the word puny.

He called Raphael's letter "very silly," but said he would print it in the September issue.

Anthony Palma, a reporter with the Catholic Register, says Catholic Insight is regarded as "quite conservative" and is known for its strident, doctrinaire views.

He said some Catholics have been offended by the tone of its articles.

Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region said the editorial is "one of the most insensitive and uninformed editorials on Israel that we have seen in a long time. We are especially concerned that a Catholic news-magazine would be so ill-informed on matters relating to Israel. They should be ashamed of themselves."

Suzanne Scorsone, a spokesperson for Toronto's Catholic Archdiocese, said she cannot comment on Catholic Insight because it is a "completely independent" publication.

פון אָלעק סילווער

MISSION PREPARES FOR HISTORIC CAMPAIGN

Seeing is believing according to participants in UJA Federation's recent mission to Moscow and Israel.

The group, which included 30 key UJA Federation volunteers, all of whom will be fundraising for the upcoming Campaign for Fifty, spent eight emotionally charged days witnessing first hand how UJA Federation dollars change Jewish lives.

"This mission will make us better campaigners," predicted UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel, who led the journey with Campaign for Fifty Vice-Chair Dr. Howard Price. "We're seeing first hand how tzedakah maintains dignity and now we must take this message back home to our donors."

The Campaign for Fifty's objective is to raise $50 million annually by 2001 - $13.5 million more than last year. The additional dollars will be allocated to specific projects that strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable and further the rescue of Jews in danger.

In Moscow, mission participants visited Jewish Agency operated summer camps where thousands of children are being exposed to their Jewish heritage for the first time. Many of them will make aliyah without their parents. "It was very emotional and heartwarming to be right there as young children and teenagers discover their Jewish identity," said Marlene Levinsky, who came on the mission with her husband.

Mission members also came face to face with Russia's aging Jewish population. Two elderly sisters, one a former engineer and one a former economist, welcomed the group into their modest one bedroom apartment and began conversing with Dr. Anna Day in Yiddish. "They were living in complete and utter poverty," explained Day. "They were so appreciative of our visit and the help they get from the Jewish Agency, yet we were the ones who felt honoured to meet them."

"What hit me the most was the fact that our support gave these people, no matter how young or old, the freedom of choice to stay in Russia or immigrate to Israel," noted Karen Perlmutter.

From despair to hope, was how one participant described the journey from Moscow to Israel, where the group visited UJA Federation funded projects such as a therapeutic riding centre in Eilat, a volunteer network of home care support services, and a battered women's shelter.

The experience was particularly moving for Israeli-born Miri Schneiderman, who experienced aspects of her homeland she never knew existed. "It was one of the best times of my life," said Schneiderman. "There wasn't one day that wasn't special.

Super Sunday. It's for the Family

Feel like taking the family for a Sunday drive minus all the traffic, smog and squeegee kids? Join hundreds of other fundraising drive participants at UJA Federation's annual Super Sunday, September 13 and help raise millions of dollars for Jews in need.

Super Sunday is the largest one day telethon blitz of the UJA Federation annual campaign. Last year, Super Sunday volunteers raised more than $2 million, before collecting an additional $300,000 during Super Week telethons.

This year, in addition to refreshments and prizes, Super Sunday will feature fully supervised children's activities from 9:00 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.- many taking place in the Albert J. Latner Jewish Public Library in the Lipa Green Building.

"We want people to bring out their entire family," says Maura Cooperberg, who is chairing Super Sunday with UJA Federation's Immediate Past Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar. "I can't think of a better way for parents and children to work together on behalf of Jews who desperately need our assistance". Cooperberg says she hopes Super Sunday will become just as much a family event as UJA Federation's popular Walk for Israel, with which she has been heavily involved for many years.

Super Sunday telethon shifts begin at 9:00 a.m. and continue to 9:00 p.m. Volunteers are also needed for Super Week (September 14 - 17) both during day and evening shifts. To sign up or to find out more information, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 115.

Community Matters

Toronto Welcomes New Shaliach

It hasn't taken long for Eli Ophir, UJA Federation's special emissary from Israel, to feel right at home in Toronto's Jewish community after arriving only a few weeks ago. But considering his genuinely optimistic outlook on Jewish peoplehood and life in general, this isn't surprising. After all, the 49 year old Israeli Army veteran turned financial consultant, makes no distinction between his native countrymen and Jews living all around the world. They're all family to him.

Eli Ophir

Ophir, who will spend the next three years assisting UJA Federation and building bridges between Israel and the Diaspora, believes wholeheartedly that the long-term survival of the Jewish people depends on the existence of Diaspora Jewry-Jews, living outside Israel's borders. "If all Jews made Israel their home, look how easy it would be for our enemies to destroy our entire people.

But it's not fear of Israel's foreign foes that weighs heavily on Ophir these days. This father of four is more concerned about threats of another kind.

"Assimilation and a lack of basic Jewish education," declares Ophir, are what worry me the most. That's why UJA Federation's work in strengthening identity is so important," says Ophir. "My role is to let people know why they should give their support."

"I'm here to help bring Israelis and members of Toronto's Jewish community a little closer by meeting face to face with as many people as possible, explains Ophir. Perhaps that's why he didn't wait very long before starting his ambassadorial work. Ophir was so eager to get to know what he now considers his new extended family, that he insisted on joining a group of 30 UJA Federation campaigners and community leaders on their recent mission to Moscow and Israel.

"It was a great bonding experience, reports Ophir. "I look forward to connecting with many other UJA Federation supporters."

Mission Moves Campaigners

It was an intense nine days for participants on UJA Federation's Worker's Mission to Moscow and Israel. Emotions ran high as 30 members of Toronto's Jewish community, led by Judy Engel and Dr. Howard Price, came face to face with an aging and impoverished Russian Jewish community on one hand, and the hope shared by thousands of olim beginning new lives in Israel, on the other. Then there were the children.The following photos, taken by Paula Feig, capture highlights of the emotional journey.

UJA Federation Women's Campaign Chair Judy Engel was joined by her daughter Tina for part of the mission.

Orthodox students lose bid for housing exemption

By JOHN WOODS
Connecticut Jewish Ledger

WEST HARTFORD, Conn. — A group of Orthodox Jewish students has lost its legal bid to be exempted from Yale University's housing policy.

A U.S. district court judge in Hartford ruled that Yale's policy, requiring some students to live in coed dormitories, does not violate federal housing and antitrust laws.

Judge Alfred Covello ruled in favor of Yale's motion to dismiss the case based on the plaintiffs' inability to prove, among other things, that the university should be held to civil rights laws normally applied to governmental agencies.

Covello made no ruling on the allegations of religious discrimination brought by the four Orthodox students. He also did not rule on whether the students' civil rights had been violated.

The students, known as the Yale Four, filed suit against the university last year, alleging that the university's on-campus living regulation conflicted with their religious beliefs. A fifth student originally involved in the suit, Rachel Wohlgelernter of Los Angeles, got married in order to escape the on-campus living requirement.

The July 31 ruling was not made public until recently.

The students announced that they would appeal the ruling to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals.

"We are extremely pleased that the court has decided this suit," said Dorothy Robinson, Yale vice-president and general counsel. "Yale College's residential requirement is premised on an educational philosophy which values bringing people of diverse backgrounds together in a vibrant community. Yale's rule does not conflict with any legal requirement."

Nathan Lewin, lead attorney for the students, said he never expected the suit to be decided in district court, and that while the ruling is a disappointment, it would be appealed.

"With all due respect to Judge Covello, the ruling is demonstrably wrong," said Lewin. "I'm disappointed, but I never expected the case to be determined by a district court judge."

The suit brought by the students – two freshmen and two sophomores – claims that dormitories which feature coed living conditions and bathrooms, as well as alleged sexual activity in the dormitories, are in violation of their Orthodox beliefs. Yale requires that in lieu of a housing fee waiver, freshmen and sophomores are required to live in university dormitories.

Appeal expected to be launched

Covello dismissed the students' allegation that Yale violated the Fair Housing Act, ruling that because Yale had offered housing to the students, they had no grounds on which to sue.

"The students could have opted to attend another university if they were not satisfied with Yale's housing policy," wrote Covello in his decision.

The judge also dismissed the claim that Yale's housing policy is in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act: that Yale essentially holds a monopoly on the housing of its students and that it is illegal for the university to tie the purchase of one good or service with another – in this case, housing with education.

Covello did not consider whether Yale had violated the students' civil rights because he determined that the Yale Four lawyers had not proven that Yale is a "state actor" or an entity with sufficient links to government to be held accountable to laws concerning civil rights infractions alleged by the students.

"We believe the judge erred in not reaching the merits of the students' religious discrimination and equal protection claims," said Lewin. "He also failed to recognize that, because of Yale's long history of state sponsorship, as well as its close cooperation with, and funding by the government, civil rights law requires it to respect the constitutional rights of its students."

Lewin said that he does not expect the Appeals Court to hear any motions until at least November, with a ruling not likely until March or April of 1999. He also said that he expects the case to eventually be heard by the Supreme Court.

Toronto students get awards at Yeshiva U graduation

Chemel earned his master's degree in social work with an emphasis on casework and community organization while working at the Baycrest Geriatric Centre counselling senior citizens with depression, and at the Hospital for Sick Children counselling patients in the burn and craniofacial unit.

Jonkman earned her master's degree in social work with an emphasis on casework while working at the Toronto Hospital as a post-surgical counsellor in the areas of neurology, neurosurgery and plastic surgery.

Wurtzweiler's block plan is unique in allowing students to earn their master's of social work as well as a certificate in Jewish communal service in three summer terms while working for social service agencies during the traditional academic year.

The program, which offers concentrations in social and clinical casework, social group work, and community organization and administration, attracts international students because of its flexibility and strong emphasis on fieldwork. The 62 students graduating this summer are from the United States, Canada and Israel.

Hamilton leader maintains Jewish roots in Jamaica

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — For the first time in 10 years, Dr. Anthony MacFarlane will not be going to his native Jamaica this fall to lead the Yom Kippur service.

As president of Temple Anshe Sholom, he says his place at that time is with his congregation here. But once his term is over, he'll return to Jamaica for the High Holy Days in future years.

MacFarlane's eyes shine with pride as he talks about Jamaican Jewish history, his Sephardi Spanish-Portuguese roots – he is a descendant of the Mendes da Costa family – and his Jamaican congregation.

But, he explained in a recent interview, he would never have gone back to his roots if it hadn't been for the welcome he received at Anshe Sholom when he first came to Hamilton 35 years ago.

"I will be in debt for the rest of my life to Temple Anshe Sholom," MacFarlane said. Introduced to the congregation through a chance encounter with one of its members, he found friends, learned about Judaism and converted.

As he researched his Spanish-Portuguese origins with the help of his cousin Harold Andrade of Miami, and Miriam Pereira Podriguez, archivist of the Spanish-Portuguese community in London, England, his commitment to Judaism deepened.

In the fall of 1988, Jamaica was struck by Hurricane Gilbert and anxious about the destruction, MacFarlane took the first available flight out. It happened to be Yom Kippur, and when he enquired about services, he was told Kol Nidrei would begin at 4 p.m. because there was no electricity. He was also told to bring a folding chair and an umbrella because the synagogue roof had blown off and the chairs were destroyed.

It was at that service, recalled MacFarlane, a family physician and the first Reform mohel in Canada, "that I promised myself I would return every year for the High Holy Days."

The congregation's spiritual leader, Ernest Henriques de Souza, who is not an ordained rabbi, gave him a tape so that he could learn the trop, and every year since then MacFarlane has chanted part of the Yom Kippur morning service.

Marranos of Spanish-Portuguese origin first settled in Jamaica in 1655, making it one of the oldest Jewish communities in the New World. During the 18th century, when the New York community had 300 Jews, Jamaica's Jewish community numbered 2,000.

Sephardi synagogue destroyed in 1907

Because of the islanders' mixed racial origins, a large number have Jewish roots; they are the out-of-wedlock offspring of Spanish-Portuguese Marranos. In fact, said MacFarlane, Jamaica can be considered a Jewish island "even in its values and thinking."

In 1907, Neve Shalom, the Sephardi synagogue in Spanish Town, was destroyed by an earthquake and fire, and all records were lost.

Today, Kingston's Shaarei Shalom Synagogue serves Jamaica's Jewish community. Known as the United Congregation of Israelites, it has 300 members, about 25 percent of whom live abroad. The Aron Kodesh is a copy of the ark in the famous Bevis Marks Synagogue of London. The floor is covered with sand, a tradition dating back to the Inquisition, when Marranos holding Jewish services covered the floor with sand in order to muffle the sound.

Approximately 100 to 150 people "of all shades of color, from jet black (the most recent converts) to white" attend High Holy Day services, MacFarlane said.

Services are Orthodox, although mostly in English, he said, with some Hebrew. Prayers involve responsive reading, and the only Portuguese prayer is one "for our brethren who are imprisoned by the Inquisition."

The prayer book is The Gaster by rabbi and scholar Moses Gaster, who was appointed chacham of the Sephardi community in England in 1887. "But because the prayer book is very expensive, we have now produced our own, The Key to the Gaster," MacFarlane said.

In 1921, the congregation amalgamated with the Ashkenazi community, "who gave us all their ritual objects, and we agreed to follow the Ashkenazi service in certain places," he said.

Among the five or six people assisting MacFarlane with the Yom Kippur service is Dr. Ronald Delevante, whose brother Michael lives in Mississauga.

Today, the community is making a determined effort to research its history and genealogy, MacFarlane reported. A CD-ROM listing 4,500 Jamaican Jewish names has just been compiled by Donald Lindo. De Souza is working on establishing an institute that will try to recapture the Spanish-Portuguese spirit, one which could be of interest to Jewish tourists. Also, Prof. Eli Faber, whose book, The Jews and the Slave Trade, will be published in September, is now writing a history of the Jews in Jamaica.

CJC cautious while BBC strongly in favor of decision

In a statement, CJC stressed that it has been particularly active on the national unity front since 1992 and strongly supported the Calgary Declaration, proposed by the provincial premiers in the summer of 1997.

But CJC-Q did not go so far as to explicitly endorse the ruling. Neither did CJC national president Moshe Ronen, who issued a non-committal statement: "This is a complex and important matter. We will be studying [it] carefully and we urge all parties to consider its implications in a spirit of reconciliation and mutual respect."

By contrast, Robert Libman, executive director of B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) Quebec region gave his strong, unambiguous support to the decision.

Libman, a former leader of Quebec's Equality party who himself scored a major victory earlier this year when he challenged the constitutionality of Quebec's referendum law before the same court, called the decision "a very positive development for federalism."

"It clearly sends an important message to Quebecers: Quebec cannot separate unilaterally without violating Canadian law," he said.

"The most important aspect is that it will force Quebecers to think twice before supporting something that violates the Canadian constitution."

Constitutional law experts polled by The CJN had mixed reactions to the ruling.

Prof. Brian Schwartz of the University of Manitoba feels the court went too far on several counts.

Schwartz feels the ruling is too generous in its attempt to accommodate nationalist sentiment in Quebec.

And he disagrees with other aspects of the decision, namely, that the rest of Canada has a legal obligation to negotiate with Quebec in the event of a referendum win, as well as with the court's view that a "clear majority" of Quebecers could decide the province's fate.

"Both are incorrect," Schwartz said flatly. "To say that there is a duty to negotiate is not appropriate. There are no competing majorities. The will of the majority of Canada does trump the majority in Quebec."

The law, he said, always "favors stability over radical change."

Schwartz also took issue with the court's ruling on whether Quebec can secede under international law. It found the province could not break away under international rules, but added that the "possibility of an unconstitutional declaration of secession leading to a de facto secession is not ruled out."

"That's totally wrong," Schwartz said. "The international community does not acknowledge secession by force or conquest." That part of the ruling "holds out a glimmer of hope to hard core nationalists. It's ill-advised."

Possible secession of Quebec

BBC's Libman said Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard would indeed use the ruling to try and bolster sovereigntist fortunes.

"Bouchard will try. But who will it sink in with? Will it sink in with his sovereigntist rabble?

"Bouchard has done well in containing his temper. But if he tries to rile up nationalist passions too much, he will look too much like a rebel trying to overturn the rule of law in this country, and that will not sit well with Quebecers who are swing voters."

For Prof. Joseph Magnet of the University of Ottawa's law school, the ruling is "very helpful" because "it helps us realize that the sky won't fall if there's a Yes vote."

Should there be a Yes vote based on a clear question, the process "will be difficult, arduous and detailed, but it will be a process governed by the constitution," Magnet said.

However, Canadians are living with "an incompletely manufactured" constitution, said Magnet, hinting at the need for new constitutional talks.

Jews in Quebec fear "being dominated and outvoted. We need to work at ways to accommodate them" and other minorities, he said.

A press release issued by BBC on the day of the court's ruling said Quebec's Jews are "extremely concerned about the possible secession of Quebec from Canada and its implications for minority communities."

B'nai Brith, in fact, wrote a brief for the Supreme Court which appeared to mirror the court's view that under international law, a unilateral declaration of independence [UDI] could only take place if the human rights of Quebecers were being violated "in a grave manner" by the federal government.

While BBC did not not intervene in the case, its brief was referred to by Yves Jolicouer, who was appointed to present the sovereigntist position when Quebec refused to send its own counsel.

Ironically perhaps, Jolicouer, Libman said, agreed with some of the positions BBC put forward, but argued that the court should not be addressing itself to the UDI question in the first place.

Zalcman Howard said CJC did not submit a brief to the court, nor has it formulated a position on UDI in general.

"But our position on unity has always been unequivocal," she said.

As well, the Supreme Court reference, she said, "underscores the civilized manner the debate has to be approached and which we hope will prevail."

Despite the possibility of a provincial election as early as this fall, Zalcman Howard said CJC's national unity committee has not yet been "reconstituted" because its proposed budget was refused.

As a result, the committee, which was chaired by Montreal's Max Bernard, does not exist at this time and will not be reinstated until a new funding formula is agreed upon, and its mandate and programming content defined, Zalcman Howard said.

Meanwhile, she said, Bernard continues to speak on national unity issues for CJC in Quebec.

Hebron tensions flare after rabbi murdered

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The murder of a rabbi in Hebron has cast a pall over already embittered Israeli-Palestinian relations.

The Aug. 20 murder, which sparked weekend clashes in the often volatile West Bank town, prompted several Israeli ministers to call for a total suspension of already deadlocked talks with the Palestinian Authority.

The government also called on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat to condemn the murder of Rabbi Shlomo Ra'anan.

Arafat has refused to condemn the recent murders of settlers. Some Palestinian officials have stated that while they are ready to condemn terror attacks on Israelis, settlers fall into a different category because of what the officials describe as their provocative behavior.

Israeli security experts suspected that Hamas was behind Rabbi Ra'anan's murder. They said they believed Hamas would choose more settler targets because of a consensus among Palestinians that attacks against settlers are legitimate.

Earlier this month, two settlers from Yizhar, Shlomo Liebman and Harel Bin-Nun, were killed by suspected Palestinian terrorists.

Although the Palestinian Authority refused Israel's demand to condemn the latest slaying, diplomatic sources in Jerusalem said Israel would not suspend the negotiations.

But political observers said the latest developments made it clear that there was little chance of rescuing the talks from their current stalemate.

Security measures were stepped up around West-Bank Jewish settlements in the wake of Rabbi Ra'anan's murder in Hebron's Tel Rumeida enclave.

Israel's army is reportedly planning to erect fences around 20 settlements in the wake of intelligence assessments that Hamas militants have targeted Jewish settlers. Army leaves have been cancelled and tanks were placed on alert in anticipation of further attacks on settlements.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced Sunday that he was authorizing the construction of permanent structures at Tel Rumeida.

A secluded Jewish neighborhood located on a hill, Tel Rumeida overlooks the centre of Hebron and its Jewish quarter.

Although the local Jewish community had purchased the land in the 19th century, it was not until 1984 that the Israeli government allowed a limited Jewish presence at the site.

Since then, the government has refrained from authorizing any expansion of the two-acre site, where seven families live in mobile homes.

The authorities had banned the construction there of any permanent housing – a policy reversed by Netanyahu's announcement.

Hours after the slaying, Israeli troops sealed off Hebron to search for the Palestinian suspected of killing Rabbi Ra'anan.

Rabbi Ra'anan's grandfather was Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Hacohen Kook, who helped inspire the modern-day settlers movement.

According to police, the attacker climbed through a window into Rabbi Ra'anan's trailer, stabbed him several times, then threw a firebomb into the living room.

The rabbi's wife escaped through a window but suffered smoke inhalation.

Tensions ran high in Hebron after Rabbi Ra'anan's murder, with Jewish settlers and Palestinians throwing eggs and rocks at one another Sunday across the divide separating the areas controlled by Israel and the self-rule authority.

Israeli troops forced back about 25 settlers attempting to cross into the Palestinian-controlled section. The troops also clashed with Palestinians throwing rocks and gasoline bombs.

Palestinian police eventually pushed back the Arab demonstrators.

In an effort to restore calm to the city, the army reinstated a guard post in Tel Rumeida and sent in more troops.

Four wounded Palestinians, who were hospitalized in a Hebron hospital, said they had been beaten by the soldiers.

In a related development, a militant Jewish settler confronted President Ezer Weizman in Hebron with shouts that he was a spy and a "danger to the public" who needed to be" institutionalized either in prison or hospital."

Baruch Marzel, who had been a member of the now-outlawed Kach movement, had waited on a street for Weizman, who was on his way to pay a condolence call to Rabbi Ra'anan's family.

Israeli observers considered Marzel's taunts to the incitement that preceded the 1995 assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Two killed by roadside bomb

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – An IDF soldier and a civilian working for the army were killed last week when a roadside bomb exploded alongside their truck just 150 metres from the Beaufort Castle outpost inside Israel's Lebanese security zone.

An IDF inquiry is concentrating on how Hezbollah gunmen managed to get so close to the position to plant the device that killed Staff Sgt. Moshe Biton, 20, of Beit She'an and Amos Halfa, 29, of Kiryat Shmona.

Their deaths also raised questions about using unprotected civilian vehicles in the security zone, such as the crane-carrying truck in which the two were travelling.

The bombing occurred around 11:30 p.m. last Thursday when an IDF convoy left the Beaufort Castle outpost to head back to Israel.

About 150 metres from the entrance to Beaufort, a large explosive device was detonated alongside the truck, apparently after other vehicles had passed.

It is believed the device was activated from a distance, possibly by Hezbollah gunmen who were observing the movement of the convoy with night-sights.

Civilians working for the army, or performing contract jobs, enter and leave the zone on a fairly regular basis. In many cases, the vehicles they use do not have armor plating or other forms of protection.

Halfa was the first Israeli civilian to be killed in the security zone in many years. He was returning home, with Biton alongside him in the truck as his military escort.

The steep winding road leading to and from the Beaufort Castle stronghold has been the scene of numerous attacks in the past, including anti-tank missile fire at convoys.

Beaufort Castle

He said attacks of this nature had occurred in the past and were unfortunately likely to happen in the future, although the IDF is constantly revising its methods to deal with the threat of roadside bombs.

But Ashkenazi said that even a chain of incidents like those last week would not disrupt the IDF.

"This is a daily war. There have been hundreds of incidents since the beginning of the year, including dozens of roadside bombs. In most of the cases, we succeeded in discovering the devices. In a few cases, however, they [Hezbollah] have succeeded."

Israeli warplanes struck at Hezbollah targets in the Jabal Soujud region last Friday morning. It was the fifth air raid on targets in Lebanon in the space of 48 hours.

Also last Friday, Halfa, the father of a three month-old daughter, was buried in Moshav Alma, near Safed, and hundreds of people, including former foreign minister David Levy, attended Biton's funeral in Beit She'an.

"It is not possible to adapt to a situation in which our soldiers are falling every day," Levy said. "The government made a decision to leave Lebanon and the IDF should be ordered to find the way to bring an end to this awful and prolonged situation. It is impossible to live with a situation in which our settlements are being harmed or our soldiers are dying in Lebanon. Another way must be found."

President Ezer Weizman told reporters last week that "a withdrawal from Lebanon is conditional on arrangements with the Syrians."

And Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Friday that Israel will continue trying to find a safe way to leave Lebanon.

Asked in an Israel Radio interview how long the situation in Lebanon would remain as it is, Netanyahu said: "It's difficult for me to say when we will be able to leave Lebanon with suitable security arrangements but I can tell you we have not stopped our efforts and attempts – some open and some less open."

He did not elaborate on specific efforts but said, "We know there is no small interest among various elements in Lebanon concerning our proposal to leave Lebanon and of course there is a response to this in some parts of the international community. "

Clinton blocks bin Laden's financial deals

By LIAT COLLINS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — U.S. President Bill Clinton launched a new offensive against Osama bin Laden by blocking all financial transactions between U.S. companies and the renegade Saudi millionaire accused of bombing two U.S. embassies in Africa.

U.S. officials called the move a limited first step toward disrupting the wealthy militant's far-flung financial empire.

Clinton warned that retaliatory cruise missile strikes at targets in Afghanistan and Sudan, which he says are part of a guerrilla network organized by bin Laden, might not be the last strike against terrorism.

"We must not allow sanctuary for terrorism – not for terrorists or for their money," Clinton said in his weekly radio address.

In his own radio interview, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu denied Israeli involvement in the U.S. attacks in Afghanistan and Sudan.

"The Americans do not need our operative aid; they have all the necessary capability to act," Netanyahu said.

Asked about the possibility of revenge attacks, Netanyahu said, "We always have this fear, because we know the surroundings in which we live, and we always continue our intelligence monitoring and acts to thwart [attacks].

Militant declares war of revenge

"But it is true that when a government, including a government of a superpower like the United States initiates action against terror – even if in this case it is a response to a murderous act – it can expect an exchange of blows or a strike back.

"This has to be taken into account, but it can in no way prevent action or else the terrorists would always win and will always hit us, the free societies. And if we never hit back, it is a certain recipe, not for a temporary escalation of terror, but its increase to unbearable proportions."

Netanyahu spoke with Clinton, and expressed support for the U.S. action.

"Israel understands [the U.S.] fight [against terror] as its own fight against international terror," Netanyahu told Clinton, according to a press statement.

Clinton apparently thanked Netanyahu for his support and for the work of the Israeli rescue team in Kenya.

On Sunday, Clinton signed an executive order directing the U.S. Treasury to block deals between bin Laden and groups believed affiliated with him and any U.S. national or company.

Two senior U.S. officials said Clinton's order was unlikely to have an impact on bin Laden's fortune, estimated at $300 million (US), because they do not believe most of his assets are subject to U.S. jurisdiction. But they said the U.S. would ask some of its allies to take similar action.

White House spokesperson Mike McCurry said the United States now has intelligence providing further proof that all six militant training camps hit by missiles in Afghanistan sustained "moderate to severe damage."

He said Washington does not know whether any leaders of bin Laden's network were casualties, and that they know nothing about bin Laden's "whereabouts or his condition."

Osama bin Laden

Islamic radicals speaking for bin Laden insisted that despite Clinton's assertion of "convincing" evidence of his role in the Aug.7 bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, he had nothing to do with the car-bomb attacks that killed 263 people and injured more than 5,000 others.

But they said bin Laden has declared a war of revenge for the U.S. missile strikes.

An Islamic militant close to bin Laden told Kuwait's Al-Rai al-Aam newspaper that the exiled dissident was not involved in the attacks against the U.S. missions.

Ayman Zawahiri, an Islamic Jihad leader wanted by the Egyptian government, told the newspaper that the only casualties from Washington's punitive missile attacks were civilians.

While U.S. allies, including Germany and Britain, leapt to the American president's support, Russian President Boris Yeltsin roundly condemned the U.S. action.

Bin Laden has long vowed to wage jihad or holy war against U.S. forces in Saudi Arabia, because of unconditional U.S. support for Israel as well as U.S. "occupation" of Islam's most sacred shrines in the Saudi cities of Mecca and Medina.

The official radio of Afghanistan's Taleban movement reported 21 people killed and 30 wounded by the U.S. attack on targets near the town of Khost. Witnesses and security sources told visiting Pakistani reporters at least 11 people had been killed and 53 wounded.

In his Israel Radio interview, Netanyahu said the principles behind the U.S. attack are also well known to Israel "and to a large extent, Israel is the one which leads the way in the fight against terror."

He said Israel understands that terrorists rely on a broad infrastructure. "It is definitely justified and acceptable that when its citizens are attacked, a government can act, not just against the terrorists themselves, but also against those who sent them and provided them the infrastructure to hurt us."

Brace for retaliation, terrorism expert warns

By AMY KLEIN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The world should brace itself for more terrorist attacks in response to the U.S. strike on Afghanistan and Sudan said Boaz Ganor, the director of the Herzliya-based International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism (ICT), at a press conference in Jerusalem Sunday.

The U.S. missile strikes probably raised the terrorists' motivation but did not severely limit their operational abilities, Ganor said, pointing out that these two factors generally determine the likelihood of a "boomerang effect."

Countries planning an offensive counter-terrorist attack should always consider the boomerang effect, he said, but "terror organizations always try to claim any attack was in revenge for operations against them."

Despite repercussions, Ganor said, there are worthy offensive targets.

"If the American evaluation was correct [that the Shifa Pharmaceutical plant was a chemical weapons factory], these aims justify the measures taken by the United States," he said.

The U.S. attacks in Afghanistan and Sudan targeted Saudi dissident millionaire Osama bin Laden, whom the United States holds responsible for the Aug. 7 bombings of the American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Israel is likely to be a target for revenge attacks, Ganor said, given that bin Laden has criticized the United States for supporting Israel.

To prevent more terrorist attacks, Ganor said, "America must make clear that they have enough intelligence and capability to escalate attacks on bin Laden's network to destroy it completely, and they must make clear to the states [that harbor terrorists] they will have to pay the price," Ganor said.

"They should also gain the support of western and eastern countries and make them understand it's an international problem," he said.

According to the ICT Web site, bin Laden is one of 53 children of Saudi construction magnate Mohammed Awad bin Laden, originally from Yemen. The family fortune is estimated at $5 billion, of which Osama bin Laden has access to $300 million.

Bin Laden moved to Afghanistan in 1979, and – aided by the Afghan government and the CIA – he trained guerrilla armies to successfully throw the Soviet Army out of Afghanistan.

After the war, many of the guerrillas, known as the Afghan Veterans went to Egypt, Algeria, and Sudan to aid Islamic extremists. Some stayed in Afghanistan. Bin Laden returned to Saudi Arabia.

After Saudi Arabia revoked his citizenship in 1994, bin Laden moved to Sudan. He was asked to leave Sudan in 1996, and moved to Afghanistan.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, Aug. 25 — Fighting flared up in Jerusalem today when Egyptian troops in new positions near the Red Cross demilitarized enclave tried unsuccessfully to advance across "no-man's land." Jerusalem's unsettled truce was shattered during the night as three southern suburbs, Mekor Chaim, Ramat Rachel and southern Talpiot, came under heavy shell fire from the direction of Beit Safafa and the Mar Elias Monastery Hill.

Premier David Ben-Gurion said the worst battles were yet to come, since "30 million Arabs in six countries would not reconcile themselves to defeat at the hands of 750,000 Jews."

Russian Jew accused of spying

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Rumors of a possible Israeli spy ring in Siberia appear to have been put to rest – but not before a slew of reports that one Russian Jewish leader says hearkened back to the Soviet era.

Last week, the deputy head of the Federal Security Service branch in western Siberia, Sergei Savchenkov, said a spy ring had recently been uncovered after a Jewish tank factory worker admitted that he passed on information about a new Russian battle tank to an Israeli agency that has offices in the former Soviet Union.

According to the security sources, Alexander Sakov, 46, a well-known Jewish activist and head of the technical bureau at the Transmach tank manufacturing company, allegedly "had free access to the construction secrets" of the tank and transmitted them to the Nativ agency.

Nativ, a unit of the Israeli prime minister's office, used to collect clandestine information on political and economic organizations in Russia. Now it only officially gathers information available through open sources.

Both Sakov and the Nativ agency denied the charges.

Sakov said in a telephone interview from his home in Omsk that since 1993, he has been providing monthly reports on anti-Semitism and the state of the Jewish community in Siberia to the Israeli Embassy in Moscow – a job for which he was paid $60 to $120 a month.

Mikhail Chlenov, president of the Russian Va'ad, the oldest Jewish umbrella organization in the country, said the charges brought against Sakov were part of a new campaign launched by the Federal Security Service that could be aimed at discrediting local Jewish leadership as informers and agents of the Israeli secret service.

Court rejects unilateral secession

judgment is very different from the pundits' Canadianized version of it – that if there are two sides to the question (or in this instance to three questions) the truth must automatically lie in the middle.

For the new political reality – and the prevailing constitutional law that underpins it – is that Quebec can no longer claim that it has a right to unilaterally secede under Canadian constitutional law, or that, at least, the present Canadian Constitution does not prohibit it. On the contrary, as the Supreme Court unanimously affirmed, the law of the Constitution, which binds Quebec no less than it binds everyone else, (putting to rest, as a matter of law, the shibboleth that the Constitution does not apply to Quebec or that you can choose which parts of the Constitution apply to you), expressly prohibits any unilateral secession, in any form. This unilateral secessionist option – clearly contemplated, for example, by the Parti Québécois in the event of a victory in the 1995 referendum – is as illegitimate as it is unconstitutional.

Similarly, Quebec can no longer claim, as it has continued to argue, that it has a right to secede under international law.

For, as the Supreme Court concluded on this point, this right is open only to a "people" that is in a "colonial" or "oppressed" state, or one whose "internal self-determination" is being so fundamentally denied that its only option is to claim it "externally." That situation, said the court, is not the Quebec reality.

The message, then, from the international legal perspective, is unequivocal. Quebec has no right to secede under international law; no such declaration of independent statehood can be regarded as self-executory, nor can any international recognition confer retroactive legitimacy upon it.

Admittedly, the court did not preclude the option of secession or even the possibility of its ultimate legitimation. But such an option – and its legitimation – must comply with a series and sequence of demanding prerequisites, both procedural and substantive.

First, and from a procedural point of view, the separatist option can only be considered if it has initially been approved in a referendum in which both the question is clear and the majority approving it is clear. In a word, as the Supreme Court repeatedly and unequivocally declared – and unlike the spin put upon the court's clear characterization of this procedural requirement – it must be "a clear question to pursue secession," so that any question which obfuscates the secessionist option or couples it with continued association with Canada is illegal and illegitimate.

Commentary

Second, there must be a "clear majority" for secession, or as the court put it, "a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada", so that a "50 plus one" numerical formula that does not clearly connote a majority preference for secession from – and, in the court's words, the "clear repudiation" of – Canada, does not constitute the "qualitative evaluation" threshold required by the court.

The court's conclusion on this point could not be more clear: "The referendum result, if it is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will, must be free of ambiguity, both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves."

Moreover, what is at issue here is not only the legality of this first set of "procedural" requirements; rather, if the secessionist option is to be ultimately legitimated, it can only be secured through a negotiated agreement anchored in four substantive and fundamental principles whose scope and significance are clearly set out in the judgment, and which include: the federalist principle, the "lodestar" of the constitutional system; democracy, "which would include not only the clear majority of the population of Quebec" but "the clear majority of Canada as a whole;" constitutionalism and the rule of law, including "the principle that a Constitution is entrenched beyond the reach of simple majority rule;" and the protection of minority rights as "an independent constitutional value," let alone the "non-derogable" protection of aboriginal rights. In a word, as the court concluded on this point, "any attempt to effect the secession of a province from Canada must be undertaken pursuant to the Constitution of Canada, or else violate the Canadian legal order."

The judgment was, indeed, a "Solomonic" one. But if "Solomonic" is to adhere to its original understanding in biblical terms (which awarded the baby in dispute to its biological mother) and not to the pundits' revisionist reading of it in contemporary terms (which envisages two babies or the dismemberment of the baby), the Supreme Court's "Solomonic" determination could not be more manifest.

No province has a right, under either Canadian or international law, to unilaterally secede from the Canadian "baby." Any initial secessionist quest necessarily presupposes a clear majority vote on a clear question in favour of secession; and even if this demanding procedural threshold be reached, it would be without any legal effect in the absence of a negotiated agreement anchored in the fundamental principles of the Canadian Constitution.

The secessionist outcome could only be reached, if it is reachable at all, with great difficulty, while all that we now have – constitutionally, politically, economically, socially – is at great risk.

For if "the threads of a thousand acts of accommodation are the fabric of a nation, it would take a thousand cuts to dismember it."

In a word, secession would effectuate the dismemberment of the Canadian "baby," and that would be anything but "Solomonic."

Irwin Cotler is a professor of law at McGill University.

Kids Who Study Music Have Greater Success in School

University of California-Irvine researchers have discovered that involving young children in music programs improves their spatial IQ — the kind of intelligence needed for math and science. The best news is that the improvement occurs whether a child is "musical" or not, and is maintained for long periods of time — perhaps permanently.

Researchers all agree on one thing: the younger the better. Five, four and even three years old is not too soon to begin teaching music to young children. It appears to strengthen important neural connections in the developing brain, giving the children an advantage in spatial reasoning.

The Yamaha Corporate Music School in the North York district has carefully researched programs tailored to the developmental levels of beginners of all ages from three years old and up! Private lessons are available for more advanced students. Free preview lessons in various courses are being offered to beginners during designated Open House days in August and September. The dates are: Saturday, August 29; Wednesday, September 2; and Sunday, September 13. Please call to reserve your free lesson: (416) 224-5590.

Success in music.
Success in life.
It's no coincidence.

The Yamaha Music School was the best place to help our daughter Laura develop her creativity. Although she is only 11 years old, she has performed her own compositions at Yamaha Junior Original Concerts in Boston, San Diego and Tokyo.

A major force in musical life of Canada

Since first opening its doors in 1886, The Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) has been a major force in the musical life of Canada. Today, more than 5,000 students enrol each year for music lessons and classes at The RCM's 2 locations in-downtown Toronto and Mississauga.

The RCM offers high quality children's programs that include fun-filled, informative classes such as Music with Your Baby, Eurhythmics, Kodaly and Orff. The Suzuki program, always a popular method of instruction with both parent and child, teaches students to play piano, violin, cello, harp or flute.

Adults can choose from programs such as Repertory Chorus, Music Appreciation, Piano, Violin or Guitar from Scratch and Brush Us Your Piano Skills, all in an encouraging environment. Students can also enrol in traditional music theory and history courses to enhance their educational experience.

Private lessons are available on a variety of instruments for students of all ages and levels. Students are individually matched with teachers who will best meet their needs and schedules. Self esteem key to success

A very credible and increasingly popular course of action for parents today is to turn to professionals who are set up to give their children extra academic assistance. Grade Expectations Learning Centres provide programs that help students to succeed in all subjects.

Grade Expectations is a Canadian company with 14 learning centres in Ontario. The education programs are developed and monitored by Dr. Gary Hunt, Chair, Faculty of Education, OISE/University of Toronto

At Grade Expectations students from grades 1 to OAC are individually assessed, prescribed an individualized program and taught by a certified teacher in a small classroom. The student to teacher ratio is never more than 3:1.

One of the most important topics covered with every student is study skills. To be a successful student it is extremely important to be able to organize work properly and to utilize time efficiently. This is just as true for the grade one student as it is for the high school student.

"We believe that self esteem is the key to any successful student, and our programs provide the opportunity for students to improve academically and to feel confident and positive about their education," says Les Rothschild, Director of Grade Expectations.

Dance, for body and soul

Studying dance can be fun as well as educational. It improves coordination, muscular development, posture and fitness. It teaches discipline and concentration, which can help you achieve your goals.

Creating beauty with your own body enhances confidence and poise; it improves music appreciation and the sense of artistic expression.

If this appeals to you or your child, call the Conservatory of Dance and Music. Here, students are encouraged to give their best. Their enjoyment, says principal Cynthia Fisher, is the driving force in developing their full potential.

Recently, the Conservatory has expanded and hired new instructors. It teaches ballet, modern, musical theatre, Irish, flamenco and jazz dancing, and Pilates Body Conditioning. There are guest workshops too; in September, a guest artist will come from Alvin Ailey Dance Theatre. Students are aged 3 to adult, with 15 per class maximum.

Cynthia is one of only 7 examiners for the Royal Academy of Dancing. Many staff are professional dancers and choreographers; many former students now work as dancers, or study in schools like Royal Winnipeg Ballet Dance School.

The Conservatory's newest location is in the Pickle Barrel Plaza. For more information, call (416) 590-9507.

A world of sport & art is yours to discover

It has been over 2 years since Discovery School of Sport and Art opened its doors, but it has quickly grown to become a home away from home for children of all ages. At Discovery you can find a little toddler learning to do front rolls to a college student-former gymnast, working out to keep in shape. Besides offering various classes in Artistic and Rhythmic Gymnastics, Trampoline, Ballet and Jazz, the Centre also holds birthday parties, seasonal camps, PD fun days and community activity events such as fundraising, etc. Discovery's 10,000 sq. ft. modern gym is filled with Olympic standard gymnastic equipment for boys and girls with a separate section for kindergym classes. Rhythmic Gymnastics is offered through the Bathurst Jewish Centre. Discovery's competitive athletes could have been seen on Rogers TV, at different competitions, community and school functions.

Besides children's programs, Discovery offers private instructions, school field trips and adult classes. Several private schools, which do not have their own gym facilities, are using Discovery gym to run weekly physical education classes.

Registrations for recreational and competitive classes are now being accepted at the Discovery Centre, 205 Champagne Dr., #5 (Finch & Dufferin). For more information please call: (416) 638-3033.

KEYBOARDERS, for your kids and you

Tomorrow's market will put great demands on your children. Through their school and adult years, typing and computer use are skills they will use daily; and since children retain knowledge easily, educators advise learning early.

Pupils who hand in neat, typed homework completed without parents' help, enjoy better self-esteem and higher grades. Moreover, typing can often help children with learning disabilities.

Since 1996, KEYBOARDERS has been a successful typing and computer school for kids and adults.

After 8-12 lessons, you will type accurately, using all 10 fingers without looking at the keyboard. KEYBOARDERS has taught hundreds, aged 7-84, to type up to 60 wpm., many of whom begin with no computer knowledge.

KEYBOARDERS special 1-2-3-GO course enables adults of all ages to be comfortable at the computer in 4 hrs. From there, you progress to word processing, e-mail use, and the Internet.

Classes are small and stress-free; the instructors give each student personal attention. And there's unlimited free practice, with an instructor always on hand. For fall schedules, call KEYBOARDERS, at Bayview and John: 905-731-4744.

Sculptor believes her skill lies in her genes

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — May Marx believes she was genetically intended to be a sculptor.

"I have the same creative hands as my father," she says. "I like to touch, to do things."

But sculpting was farthest from her practical mother's mind when Marx was starting high school. As the eldest of six, she was expected to be sensible, take a commercial course and begin contributing at home.

Then, 35 years ago, Marx happened on a clay modelling demonstration which piqued her interest. The experience blossomed into an ongoing passion and she became determined to learn everything she could about sculpture and related arts.

A wife and mother of two, she realized that, despite her immersion in sculpture, she had to "double my life, not sacrifice family to art."

She originally fashioned figurative pieces, but discovered that the abstract freed her. "I always felt that when I was doing figurative work, I wasn't creating. Someone bigger than I had done it," she says.

She began to strip away the extraneous, to get to the heart.

Working in her light-filled downtown studio, Marx explores the fundamentals of human relationships – caring, confrontation, strength, weakness. She also responds to an inner surge when thought explodes into dynamic images, in a dramatic eclipse, a solar outburst.

Bronze is her medium; the golden glow mirror polish and the more subtle patina reflect what she is saying. She can conjure a range from excitement to fine nuance of emotion.

Her striking Continuum #2, which places a clearly dominant male in close proximity to an aggressive but physically weaker female, takes on a different aura when each of two identical sculptures is given a different finish. In this way, various aspects of sensuality and confrontation are revealed.

Milestone is a tender evocation. Marx, who generally refuses to explain her works, preferring the viewer's own interpretation, acknowledges that this particular piece – two watchful figures guiding a slender youth – recalls her son's wedding when she and her husband led him toward the chupah.

Marx's work is found in North American and European galleries, and in corporate and private collections. Among the owners of her original sculptures are Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, Chrysler Corporation's Lee Iacocca and contralto Maureen Forrester. Marx has also been represented in a video and in several art publications.

This fall, from Sept. 10 until Oct. 24, Marx is presenting a solo exhibition in a beautiful gallery built by the late philanthropist Andrew Carnegie in the town of Harriston, Ont., just 40 miles west of Orangeville.

Poems reflect love for Israel

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He left Harbord Collegiate at Grade 10 and doesn't like to read poetry, but David Zaretsky has written 1,000 poems about his life and beliefs.

Many of his poems, such as Now Once Again We're a Nation and Israel Belongs to Me, reflect Zaretsky's love and aspirations for Israel.

He was born on Augusta Avenue in Toronto 78 years ago, and the simple words and rhymes of his poems grow from his experiences in raising a family and working 12 hours a day as the owner of the Martinway Plaza variety store in Etobicoke with only four two-week holidays in 16 years.

Like their content, the titles of many of Zaretsky's poems suggest the perplexities of life for a Jewish senior in society today. They include I'm Talking But No One is Listening, It Doesn't Help At All to Watch TV, What Can I Teach My Children? and There Isn't A Day I Don't Cry.

But the beauty of nature is not lost on this people's poet who writes that the best way to see the country is from a train window, and who describes nature's grandeur from the base of a mountain.

Recently he gave a reading in the chapel of the Bernard Betel Centre and his audience responded to his simple and entertaining way of describing pedestrian events.

"I love it," says Zaretsky of his poetry. He started to write seriously about 20 years ago, often getting up in the middle of the night to write down his thoughts in longhand. He never types his poems.

Though he started to write when he was 10, his family ridiculed his early efforts.

As a beer slinger in his brother Benny's Piccadilly Hotel on King Street West in the '30s, he met a lot of celebrities. Once he dedicated a poem, Up the Ladder and Down the Ladder, to Dooley Wilson, who played the piano and sang As Time Goes By in the film Casablanca.

Zaretsky is a member of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue who attends Shabbat services every week, and several of his poems speak of the importance of religion in his life.

He started out writing songs but found that record companies wanted only rock and roll. "All my poems are really lyrics for songs, I want them to flow in that way."

His philosophy can be summed up in the title of one of his poems, Why Do We Jews Hold Our Heads High?

From Abstraction to Realism

Marcia Rafelman Fine Arts is hosting an exhibition From Abstraction to Realism until Sept. 14. To celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary, all the artists involved are donating 10 percent of the sales to Israel at 50.

Two exhibitors of note are Jewish photographers David R. Cowles and Motty Levy.

Cowles' photographs were taken during a series of trips to North Africa to document remaining Jewish historic sites in Morocco, Egypt and Tunisia "before they disappear completely."

Levy's photographs focus on Hebron and Jerusalem. He said he wanted to get "a close up look at the people in the heart of the [Middle East] conflict."

Marcia Rafelman is at 10 Clarendon Ave., Toronto.

ARTISTS FEATURED AT ISRAEL AT 50 PAVILION

Israel's past, present and future are highlighted at the Israel at Fifty pavilion at the Canadian National Exhibition, thru Sept. 7.

As publicized in*The CJN* several weeks ago, the pavilion features themed food, art, entertainment and shopping areas. Imported from Israel, a fifth-century synagogue mosaic floor is also on view.

Discovered in Tzippori in 1994, the floor measures 45 feet by 13 feet and has never before been displayed outside of Israel.

The travelling exhibit A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood, by Rafi Aaron, is among many displays by Canadian artists being showcased at the pavilion.

The pavilion also features live entertainment and musical performances almost around the clock. Performers include Faye Kellerstein (Aug. 30, 11 a.m.),Toronto Little Puppet Theatre (Aug. 31, 3 p.m.), Toronto Jewish Folk Choir (Sept. 1, 7:45 p.m.), Brian Katz (Sept. 3, 2 p.m.) and Judith Cohen (Sept. 7, 11 a.m. & noon).

Ashkenaz: A Day of Yiddish Culture is scheduled at the pavilion for Sept. 6. Featured artists include the klezmer band Finjan, the Arab-Yiddish fusion quartet Medina, Yiddish singer Beth Anne Cole and comedienne Deb Filler, along with a series of films on Yiddish and Israeli subjects. 11 a.m. to 8 p.m.

In the Spotlight: Canadian-Jewish writer Fredelle Maynard, who died in 1989, is best remembered for her two books Raisins and Almonds (1972) and The Tree of Life (1988) as well as her many magazine articles. She and her late husband Max are also remembered as the parents of two very accomplished daughters.

They are Rona Maynard, editor of the prominent Canadian women's magazine Chatelaine, published in Toronto; and Joyce Maynard, a California-based journalist-writer whose latest book, a memoir called At Home in the World, has already excited much interest though it is not scheduled for publication (by Picador) until October.

Salinger in Love, a section of the book excerpted in the current issue of Vanity Fair magazine, describes the author's nine-month love affair with the reclusive American author J.D. Salinger. It occurred back in 1972 when she was a promising writer of 18 and Salinger a legend at 53, famous for such literary creations as Catcher in the Rye and Nine Stories.

They met after she wrote a "precocious, provocative"cover story for the New York Times Magazine and he sent her a letter of admiration in response. Soon she was addressing him in her letters as Jerry and he was writing her that he felt they were "landsmen."

As Maynard explains: "Literally, a landsman is a person who comes from the same place, back in the Old Country. A landsman is someone with whom you find a connection of the heart and soul."

She moved into his New Hampshire retreat, but after a new book she had written started to generate phone calls from the media, he uttered prophetically, "This book of yours could be the end of us." Shortly afterwards he sent her packing, and the two landsmen apparently never crossed paths again.

Salinger's involvement is obviously what makes Maynard's teenaged affair appealing for Vanity Fair readers. The magazine, which refers to Maynard on its cover as "J.D. Salinger's Lolita," uncovered a few rare photos of Salinger, apparently taken by strangers during fleeting encounters.

The creator of the literary Glass family has spent a lifetime assiduously avoiding publicity; so one imagines he is cringing at this highly sensationalized intrusion into his private life by a former trusted companion.

While Maynard may be violating a friend's trust, she would probably argue that she has every right to write about her own experiences, especially after a quarter of a century. Incidentally, she is not the least publicity-shy and has posted extensive details of her life on her own Web site, located at [www.joycemaynard.com/home/html].

Role as an extra gave producer a revelation

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

TORONTO — Most remember the late '80s CBC melodrama Street Legal as a better-than-average Canadian ripoff of L.A. Law.

But for Jules Pitch, it was a revelation.

His stint as a Street Legal extra – with a couple of lines that "ended up getting cut" – changed the 24 year-old Vancouver Film School (VFS) graduate's life ambition from acting to producing.

As the kind of kid who could see three films a weekend, the Richmond Hill resident has "always loved movies" and had completed a summer acting workshop at the Leah Posluns Theatre before his Street Legal gig.

"But once I got on the set of Street Legal, everything changed," he said. "I noticed that there was much more."

"I wanted to be the person who puts everything together, not just reading lines from a page," Pitch recalls.

Graduating from Bayview Secondary School, Pitch spent a year in a "hands-on, all-film production" program at the VFS.

There he absorbed the filmmaking basics like script writing, directing and editing. But he learned "absolutely nothing about producing" and its schmooze-oriented skills of organizing, financing and hiring.

He finished in the fall of 1993. "This is where the whole Pitch story begins," he says.

A 15-minute short film made with a friend at the VFS, Museum of Love, went on to win best short film at the small 1994 Nantucket Springfest.

This could be a Chasing Amy

The award led to work in Nantucket as associate producer and first assistant director on the experimental short film Ocean Wine. The film eventually won gold for best experimental short at the 1995 Charleston Film Festival and was a finalist for best original dramatic short at the 1995 Houston International Film Festival.

At the festivals, the aspiring producer began promoting a new project, a full-length feature film called Lost in Limbo that he describes as "a mix of Swingers, a [British] thriller called Shallow Grave and a film called Beautiful Girls."

Written by fellow VFS graduate Darren Sacks – who Pitch says "writes dialogue better than anyone else I know" – Lost in Limbo is "a twenty-something film, a Generation X film but it's not. It's a realistic film about life in your 20s," he says. "Part of the film is about how far would you go to get what you want."

Pitch puts the film in the same Gen-X indie category as writer/director Kevin Smith's Clerks, and Chasing Amy and Swingers by writer/director Jon Favreau (who may be better known as Monica's software billionaire boyfriend on NBC's Friends).

He's looking to spend about $1,000,000 (US) on the project – versus the roughly $250,000 and $750,000 (US) reportedly spent on Swingers and Chasing Amy respectively – which will star recognizable, if not famous, actors.

Modestly hoping for festival-circuit word-of-mouth and limited theatrical release – "Carlton, Canada Square kind of thing" – Pitch feels the film "could make $6 million This could be a Chasing Amy."

While developing what he hopes will be his big break, Pitch has been producing and directing music videos (most recently for new country artist John McCabe).

He also spent a year with Microtainment Plus International, a production company where Pitch received a National Training Mentorship Award from the Canadian Film and Television Production Association to work as a production manager trainee on the recently aired A&E documentary Peace, Love and Murder: the Ira Einhorn Story.

Jules Pitch on the set in Nantucket.

Although Pitch says "there is talent that is ready to commit" to his feature, including a "major Canadian producer" and a young actor with extensive Canadian television and film experience, he and co-producer Mitchell Worsoff, 29, have yet to establish their own production company or secure financing.

"I don't even have business cards," Pitch says.

Nevertheless, with a letter from American indie production company October Films expressing interest in distributing a project it feels "has great theatrical potential," Pitch says there's a "75 percent chance" a "Brazilian investor" will pay the tab on the risky venture.

But any potential investor could reap future gains by helping out an up-and-comer, Pitch says. If Lost in Limbo is a success, "we'll have a name," and "anyone who gives us a shot will benefit."

He says confidently: "We've got a project that's going to go. It's just a matter of when, how and how much."

Compelling pencil drawings are artist's legacy

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Benjamin Goldfarb's drawings are not for sale.

The 86-year-old retired chemical engineer has created more than 40 compelling black and white pencil drawings of some of the world's most famous faces, objects and classical sculptures.

In his home in north-west Toronto, the walls are covered with impressive likenesses of Albert Einstein, John Kennedy, Martin Luther King, Beethoven and numerous others.

Based on the Italian renaissance style of drawing, his work also includes the hands of Jascha Heifetz, the hands of Mohammad Ali and drawings of sculptures such as Rodin's The Thinker.

Goldfarb says that although he has loved art since he was a child, he did not take his art seriously until he retired in 1980, when he enrolled in the Ontario College of Art and studied there for five years.

Goldfarb also has a passion for classical music and opera and he has an extensive library of books, tapes and CDs. His love of all the classical arts attracted him to the style of drawing he chose to do.

His drawings have been exhibited at the Ontario College of Art when he was a student there, and at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, where he is a member.

Goldfarb was born in Warsaw. In 1939, he escaped to Bialystock, where the Russians wanted the refugees to become Russian citizens. When they refused, they were sent to a labor camp in northern Siberia.

"The Russians saved our lives," Goldfarb says. "When war broke out, the refugees were released from the labor camp on the agreement that they would join the Second Polish Corps to fight the Nazis."

After leaving the labor camp in 1942, Goldfarb and the others went to join the newly formed Polish Army, part of the Eighth British Army, and he participated in the invasion of Italy.

When the war ended, Goldfarb discovered that all his family had perished in the war.

He ultimately located cousins in Toronto who brought him to Canada in 1948, where he later married Alice. They have a son Avery and two grandchildren, Adam and Erica.

He does not want his art to be sold. "My drawings are for my family," he says. "This is my legacy to my family."

Benjamin Goldfarb's work – like Jascha Heifetz's Hands– are notable for their amazing detail. Goldfarb, 86, said he doesn't want to sell his pencil drawings. [Cynthia Gasner photo]

Israeli company finds way to help stutterers

By LISA SAMIN
WZPS

JERUSALEM — At the age of five, Arye Friedman, an immigrant from Latvia, began his long, hard battle with stuttering. Today Friedman, 29, runs his own high-tech company in Israel, Speech Therapy System (STS), and with the use of his own computerized stuttering treatment program, is helping thousands of people who stutter, maintain their speaking fluency.

Growing up in Riga, Latvia, Friedman, small, wiry and soft spoken, was an achiever. At the age of 16, he was Latvia's classical wrestling champion, and later, received a theoretical physics and computer science degree from Latvia State University. At that time, he was also undergoing the spiritual journey that would eventually lead him to Israel.

In 1984, a relative, Mordechai Lipkin (who was killed in 1994 in a terrorized attack near Tekoa) took Friedman to a clandestine, two-month-long seminar in Riga held by Jewish activists. There, he was exposed for the first time to religious observance – kashrut, prayer and mitzvot.

With the breakdown of the Communist regime in 1987, Jewish activities became legal, and Friedman became one of the founders of Riga's Jewish Youth Union.

In 1988, a B'nai Akiva emissary from Sweden came to Riga to meet with Friedman and his friends, and they agreed to help him organize Jewish camps in Sweden and in Riga. The interaction with the 50 children in the Riga camp strengthened Friedman's religious convictions, and in 1991 he made aliyah.

While studying for his PhD in physics at Ben-Gurion University in the Negev, and learning a completely new language, Friedman came face-to-face with his stuttering problem. His supervisor wanted him to be a teaching assistant, but he could not lecture in front of a class. So the supervisor paid him his teaching wages in advance to enable him to participate in a three-week precision fluency shaping course run by Hadassah University Hospital's audiology and speech department. The course changed his life.

"After completing the course, I returned to the university to teach. It was there that I got the idea to develop a software program for precision fluency shaping. Many people who stutter take courses, get over stuttering, but then have relapses because they are not keeping up with their training. The courseware we developed is not a medical tool, but it does help people maintain their progress and speech fluency," says Friedman.

In 1991, with his inherent determination, Friedman requested a grant from the Office of the Chief Scientist (OCS) in the Ministry of Industry and Trade. Not only did he receive a two-year OCS grant and a grant from the settlement department of the World Zionist Organization, Friedman was also chosen by the OCS to become part of an incubator – an organizational framework to support and guide start-up high-tech companies. In 1992, Speech Therapy Systems was born, and now has 10 employees, mostly highly trained engineers from the former Soviet Union.

"The first version of the fluency shaping courseware was in Hebrew, and was used at Hadassah hospital courses, where it is still being used," says Friedman. "We then developed versions in English and German and conducted [customer trial sites] in the United States, Canada and Germany."

The computerized stuttering treatment program, named Dr. Fluency, sells for $499 and incorporates all the exercise material, specialized training tools and methodology needed for effective stuttering therapy, into an attractive and user-friendly environment. The program includes a clinician's package, a home-use package and a post-treatment fluency maintenance package. In this way, says Friedman, "the person who stutters can use the program with a professional speech-language pathologist, individually, or as a fluency maintenance program."

In addition to Dr. Fluency, STS has developed technology for adapting programs from differing computer systems to the Internet. This includes Internet applications, publishing data on the Internet, generators for the Internet and connecting programs to the Internet. Currently, it is looking for strategic partners for advancement of their technologies.

Vladimir Zeev Zeitlin, the company's chief software developer and a former deputy director of the Economic Planning Ministry of Tajbekistan, together with newcomer Jeremy Sulzbacher, a financial consultant from England, now STS's vice-president of operations, have been instrumental in STS's development. "The entire staff of STS is made up of highly motivated new immigrants," says Sulzbacher. "It is amazing how people from the former Soviet Union have adapted so quickly to a more liberal economic society."

Today, STS exports its products to the United States, Germany and Canada, and a new Swedish version of Dr. Fluency has just been completed.

STS is an example of how the professional talent of new immigrants can be channeled into creating successful enterprises in Israel. And for Friedman and his staff, their high-tech knowledge is not only advancing Internet technologies, but touching human lives by giving people who stutter the tools to deal more effectively with their problem.

Hockey bug hits home for Israeli teens

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Matan Nemenoff has a very steep learning curve.

Prior to 18 months ago, the 16-year-old Israeli student had never heard of the game of hockey – let alone seen anyone play the game.

Today he's a hockey junkie, a sabra rink rat whose favorite place is between the boards, skating with the puck and making plays.

Only 18 months into his hockey career, Nemenoff is no ankler barely able to make it down the ice. On the contrary. He's already worked his way onto the Israeli national junior team – okay, they're not exactly the Memorial Cup champs – and he represented his country at an IIHF Pool D tournament in Luxembourg last March. Despite it being his first-ever tournament, he was named the Israeli team's MVP.

Last summer, he attended the Roger Neilson hockey camp, Middle Eastern division, which was held at Canada Centre in Metulla, home to Israel's only Olympic-sized skating rink. More recently, he and fellow national team player Amit Shoham, 15, travelled to Canada to participate in Neilson's summer hockey school in Lindsay, Ont.

Neilson, who will hold his second consecutive hockey camp in Metulla in August, took a liking to the boys last year and offered them spots in his Canadian school free of charge, said Jeff Budd, a Canadian who has worked in Canada Centre. Enrolment at the camp goes for $990 a week.

For Nemenoff and Shoham, the trip to Canada was a hockey highlight in their young careers. Especially gratifying for the boys was their ability to hold their own and even excel at the camp, playing against more seasoned skaters from Canada, the United States, France and even Spain.

Trip to Canada was a highlight

"I had a good camp. I enjoyed it a lot," Nemenoff said.

The hockey bug has bit Nemenoff hard. He's no longer content to travel the 1½ hours from his home in Karkom, a small town north of Kinneret, to Metulla for his twice weekly practices. Instead, he desperately wants to move to Canada and take up the sport more seriously.

"I really love hockey and I want to stay with a family and play," he said.

His plans are not without precedent. A few years ago, Israeli national team member Ran Oz played one year for the Midget Marlies in Toronto and was sought after by other, more senior, teams. But instead of pursuing a hockey career in Canada, the big defenceman decided to return to Israel.

Nemenoff, a centre, wants nothing more than to play the game. "Let me play hockey. I don't care about anything else...I feel that every time I'm on the ice, I get better and better."

For him, living in a hockey hotbed like Canada would be a dream come true. One of the boys' first stops in Toronto was to an equipment store, where Nemenoff purchased a new pair of skates to replace the pair that NHLer Bill Lindsay, an instructor at the Neilson's Metulla camp, left with him last year.

Shoham, a native of Kibbutz Sde Nechemia, a 15-minute drive from Metulla, doesn't quite share Nemenoff's hockey passions, at least on this side of the ocean. "I like hockey, but I like Israel more. I want to develop hockey in Israel," he said.

His first exposure to the sport came five years ago after his brother suggested he try skating at Metulla. Even though the skates the rink provided him were of poor quality, he loved the sport.

"I like everything that's cold. I like skiing on the Hermon, I like winter," he said. "I expected it to be cold in Toronto."

Shoham and Nemenoff credit Boris Mindel, Canada Centre's Russian-born coach who played in the Soviet Elite League, with teaching them the fundamentals of the game.

"I was his first player. He taught me everything. We have a great relationship," Shoham said.

Shoham, a defenceman, found skating backward the hardest skill to master. "I used to say, 'I can't do it,' but he urged me to continue. Right now, I'm the best skater backwards."

Matan Nemenoff and Amit Shoham

Last summer, Shoham volunteered during the Maccabiah Games' hockey competition, which was held in Metulla. For Nemenoff, it was his first exposure to high calibre players who played the game with skill and speed.

A hockey nut like Nemenoff, but with access to satellite TV, Shoham used to get up at 2 a.m. during the winter to watch NHL games on ESPN.

Both players are happy with their performances at the IIHF tournament, in which Israel – this time without the aid of Canadian ringers – finished sixth out of eight teams. The undermanned Israelis went with only one and half lines and double shifted their defencemen. Both skaters were team rookies but they played about 14 minutes a period. Even though he hadn't heard of a two-line pass until the tournament, Nemenoff was Israel's best player.

Neilson, meanwhile, knows about Shoham and Nemenoff from last year's hockey camp in Metulla. Both were noticeable by their abilities and "they wanted to test themselves against Canadian kids," he said. In Lindsay, "they played very well...They showed they were not outclassed."

In Metulla, "the Israeli kids, particularly the younger ones, were very eager to play. They were scrappy. It looks like they'd make good hockey players."

Neilson, who'll be visiting Israel for the fourth time this summer, will be accompanied by three instructors from his hockey school and by Philadelphia Flyer Danius Zubrus.

One of the Flyers' young stars, Zubrus was eager to participate in the school, said Neilson, his coach in Phillie. It was difficult to recruit other players, partly because of the Katyusha rocket attacks last summer but more so because most players are just getting into their pre-season training regimen, he added.

The Inside Back

Auschwitz crosses spark crisis

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME – A growing forest of more than 130 crosses near the gates of Auschwitz has sparked a new crisis in the perpetually strained relations between Poles and Jews.

The crisis, however, reflects not only continuing friction between Jews and Polish Catholics over the former death camp, it also underscores tensions within Poland's Roman Catholic Church itself, within the country's center-right coalition government, and between the church and state.

"This is not a Catholic-Jewish war yet," Konstanty Gebert, editor of the Polish Jewish magazine Midrasz, said in an interview. "So far, it is a conflict within the Catholic community itself, where a group of fundamentalist fanatics has hijacked the entire issue."

In an attempt to defuse the situation, the Polish government took legal control of the field where the crosses have been erected.

"This will make further actions possible," Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek was quoted as saying.

In addition, a government source in Warsaw said Polish Foreign Minister Bronislaw Geremek was to meet with Polish-born Pope John Paul II this week at the Pope's summer residence near Rome. Geremek's visit was private, but he was sure to discuss the issue and a possible papal response to it.

Polish Cardinal Josef Glemp, who has antagonized Jewish leaders in the past with his comments about the legacy of Auschwitz, has already called on Catholics not to erect new crosses, but to no avail.

Backed by some hard-line priests, radical Catholics began setting up the crosses just outside the walls of the former Nazi death camp at the end of July to protest the possible removal of a 21-foot cross that stands there. That cross was used by the Pope in a mass at Auschwitz in 1979.

Kazimierz Switon, the radical Catholic activist who organized the actions, called last week for supporters to place even more crosses at the site – defying Cardinal Glemp and other Polish bishops, local and international Jewish organizations, Polish media and other groups.

He said he wanted 152 crosses to stand there to commemorate Poles who were killed at the death camp where an estimated 1.5 million people were killed, 90 percent of them Jews.

Throughout the world, Auschwitz is regarded as the symbol of the Holocaust and the biggest Jewish graveyard. Jews say no religious symbols should be allowed to be placed there.

But tens of thousands of Polish Catholics also were killed there, and Poles regard the camp as the symbol of Polish suffering under the Nazis.

During the past decade, Auschwitz has been the scene of several conflicts between Jews and Polish Catholics, most notably over the establishment of a Carmelite convent in a building just outside the camp.

The nuns eventually were moved to a new convent after the conflict was resolved in 1993. The so-called papal cross stands in a fenced-in area near the building that had been used as the convent.

"The fact is that most of the people involved now in setting up the new crosses do not have any noble reason for what they're doing," a Catholic source who has followed the affair told JTA.

"It's not about the Holocaust," he said. "It's a provocation by reactionaries opposed to Polish integration into Europe and transformation into a modern democratic state. They are using anti-Semitism [in the guise of national pride]."

Gebert said it was disappointing that Jews had to explain again why crosses were not acceptable at Auschwitz and to restate Jewish determination to combat religious symbols there.

But, he said, the atmosphere surrounding the current crisis so far is different from that during the Carmelite crisis.

"It is important to note that there is none of the knee-jerk, rally-around-the-cross reaction characteristic of the previous conflict," he said. "The opinions of the church leadership are diversified, and public opinion takes a much more relaxed stance."

Indeed, while a recent survey showed that more than 70 percent of Poles wanted to prevent removal of the large cross associated with the Pope, only 32 percent of those surveyed supported the erection of new crosses.

Many Jewish groups in Poland and abroad have called for the crosses to be removed, but Jews so far have refrained from public demonstrations at the site.

During the convent crisis, Poles reacted with an outrage tainted with anti-Semitism when New York Rabbi Avi Weiss and his followers climbed over the walls and into the cloistered convent as part of a protest.

"Jewish reaction so far has been dignified and determined," Gebert said. "We need to keep it that way. Any demonstrations in front of the crosses would only inflame matters further. As long as there is hope for a negotiated solution, such measures should be avoided."

But, he added, "If that hope does dim, then we may have to reconsider."

About Life

Dear Ella,

With the High Holy Days just around the corner, it was time for me to purchase my tickets for the services.

I must admit that I don't attend prayer services regularly. I am one of those people the rabbi usually mentions in his sermon who come to shul only for the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services and never see the inside of a synagogue the rest of the year. Unfortunately, almost every year there is someone I have an argument with over the seating. There is no reserved seating on the tickets; it works on a first come first served basis. Inevitably the shul will be full and there will be someone with his or her coat stretched out over three empty seats, or two siddurim sitting on empty chairs, or there will be someone who removes a siddur from a chair to sit down and then the wars begin. I don't go to shul to hear this or to go through this musical chairs type game. It's ridiculous. Is there a tactful way I can get around this on the holidays?

Seatless at Shul

Dear Seatless at Shul,

We've all been there. Unfortunately this happens not only in shuls, but in any place where there is a crowd of people and a limited number of seats. People want to sit with their relatives or friends at shul and they forget the reason they are there.

I agree it is annoying and I myself have been in some tiffs over a "held" empty seat when there was nowhere else to sit. The thing to do is to take a step back and look at the whole picture. Why are you there? It is Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur and you are there to pray and to think about your behavior as a good, caring decent human being. Don't start off fighting. That is not the way to spend your energy on the Holy Days.

Ask politely if you may sit in the empty seat till another seat becomes available or until the relative arrives. I know you feel you have a right to the seat, as you are there first and the other person is not; however, this isn't the time or place to argue over pettiness. If it means you have to stand until a seat becomes available, so be it. You will not change these people, and arguing will set the tone for your whole stay in shul.

Stay focused on your prayers and the real reason for being in shul.

Let us not lose sight of the individuals

Kol Yisroel areivim zeh bazeh – every Jew is responsible one for the other. The significance of this saying struck me with particular force during the United Israel Appeal Israel 50 Mission to Minsk and Israel, which I was privileged to be part of earlier this year.

Most of us have some idea of the work funded by United Jewish Appeal in Canada, such as education, relations with government, immigrant absorption, and continuity efforts. We take pride, as we should, in the assistance UJA, through its affiliation with Keren Hayesod, gives to Jews in Israel and in other parts of the world.

But for the most part, we think of UJA, if we think of it at all, in vague, almost philosophical terms. We give to UJA, often because we feel an obligation to do so, rather than because we feel an emotional touch of the heart.

My trip let me see the other side of the equation – the human side. I visited a disabled, lonely former surgeon in the Russian army, whose only contact with the outside world is through the services to Jewish seniors offered by Keren Hayesod.

A charming family served up a lavish spread, complete with vodka, while talking about their son, who is studying in Israel, thanks to the Na'ale 16 program, a Jewish Agency and Keren Hayesod project. And the son was thrilled to receive a packaged of home-made cookies that we brought him in Jerusalem.

An elderly matron wearing a sheitl proudly showed off exquisite wall hangings she had made at a seniors centre in an old stone building in Jerusalem, while in another room, an immigrant from France demonstrated how to fashion gold jewelry.

It is very easy to see the Jewish community, or any community for that matter, as merely a series of organizations, institutions and causes. But we must not lose sight of the individuals that make up the community – the young, the old, the athletic, the artistic, the healthy and the sick or disabled, the well-known and the people in the background.

They are what give vibrancy and color. They give meaning and purpose to the infrastructure that sometimes seems to be the be-all and end-all of our interest.

This Community Focus supplement tries to strike a balance between the two concepts, by examining, for instance, what goes on at the Lipa Green Building, and also talking to a Sephardi bride. A supplementary school in the downtown area celebrates its 20th anniversary, and a volunteer confides her feelings.

It is important to remember that the community could not function without its organizations and institutions. Similarly, those same organizations and institutions could not continue without the support of community members or without taking into account their unique and collective needs.

Region needs central Jewish address

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Sephardic Kehila Centre

VAUGHAN — Is a central address in the future for York Region's booming Jewish population?

Community planners say a Lipa Green Building/Bathurst Jewish Centre-style "campus," pulling together several services and programs, is in "discussion stages" for the region.

Smaller Jewish communities in Canada, namely in Winnipeg and Ottawa, recently opened campuses with a special view toward combining services for the elderly and the young.

In York Region, "if the right property is found, [plans for a central address] would become serious," says Perry Romberg, UJA/Federation's point man in the region.

It's the sort of "problem" most Jewish communal planners would love to sink their teeth into: how to provide for Canada's fastest growing Jewish community.

According to the 1991 federal census, York Region's Jews numbered 45,000. Officials believe the tally today is closer to 50,000.

That makes the sprawling area north of Steeles Avenue home to Canada's third-largest Jewish community. Put another way, more Jews live in the region than in Vancouver, Winnipeg and Ottawa combined.

And here's the clincher: officials with UJA Federation expect York Region's Jewish population to swell to 75,000 by 2010 – a 50 percent jump in just 11 years.

To keep pace, Federation recently struck a community planning and allocations committee to focus on York Region's phenomenal growth.

Committee chair Louis Greenbaum says a campus would serve as a community hub and provide social, cultural, recreational and religious programs.

The committee is giving the idea "a strong priority," Greenbaum said, adding that in the meantime, it is working to identify the needs of the community and the type of services that exist.

Across southern York Region, schools, synagogues, outreach centres and kosher services dot the landscape. Jewish life is especially vibrant in Thornhill (both in Vaughan and Markham). Indeed, whereas Jews represent 8.7 percent of York Region's total population, they account for 28 percent of all Thornhill residents.

Jewish families can also be found in Richmond Hill, Aurora,

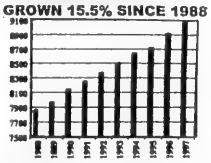
REFORM JUDAISM HAS GROWN 15.5% SINCE 1988



Reform is Judaism grounded on God's living reality; where each person is God's partner in the sacred task of repairing an imperfect world. Reform Judaism sanctifies the individual, yet commands informed and conscientious choices in religious practice.

Jews in York Region

Newmarket and even as far north as Sharon and Holland Landing.

It's all the result of the community's northward push. Early immigrants settled on downtown streets like Cecil and Baldwin; their children moved "uptown" to St. Clair and Eglinton; and the next generation has crossed the psychological boundary of Steeles Avenue.

But all along, notes Romberg, the community has clung to the Bathurst Street corridor like a lifeline.

Community planners have seen a large influx into the region of South African, Russian and Israeli emigres, as well as many ex-Montrealers.

Normally, York Region gets lumped into the Jewish figures for the Greater Toronto Area, but there are significant differences "up north."

Because it is mainly a bedroom community, it is a young one. Federation figures say that in Metro, 16 percent of the Jewish population is 14 years old and under; in York Region, it's fully 34 percent.

And over half the region's Jewish population is between 30 and 49.

But planners are also projecting a rise in the number of Jewish seniors. That's why Baycrest is awaiting word from the government on its proposal to build a 160-bed long-term care facility in the region. Baycrest already provides geriatric services through Markham-Stouffville Hospital.

About a dozen years ago, the Spring Farm subdevelopment in Thornhill led the way in Jewish growth, pulled along by the Beth Avraham Joseph of Toronto Congregation.

Romberg says there are now over 30 Jewish organizations in the region. Last year, UJA Federation itself opened an office there (1118 Centre St.), also home to B'nai Brith Youth Organization.

In recent years, Reena and the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism have moved north of Steeles.

As well, there are three new day schools, an office of Jewish Family & Child Service, and branches of Aish Hatorah and Ohr Somayach – all within a kilometre of one another.

Last autumn, the growing Sephardi community celebrated the opening of the Sephardi Kehila Centre on Bathurst, just north of Steeles.

And earlier this summer, Chabad-Lubavitch broke ground in Thornhill for a new community centre.

Romberg says he feels that among the community's needs are "Jewish life education... whatever can enhance Jewishness."

Another project is to reach out to the region's unaffiliated Jews, by some accounts, estimated to be half the population.

Jewish theatre scene changing

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Jewish theatre scene in Toronto is a far cry from what it was a few generations ago when the city bustled with Jewish theatre groups and plays with Jewish content.

"We used to express our creative needs through theatre but there is a disinclination now to spend the time it requires," said Ralph Wintrob, head of the Jewish Theatre Committee (JTC).

A lack of information about theatre projects in the community is another reason why the scene has dried up, he said.

But although the state of Jewish theatre is not as healthy as it was, it is certainly not dead.

The 444-seat Leah Posluns Theatre at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) is booked 80 percent of the time, and the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is building a 275-seat theatre as part of its revamped facilities.

But the fee of $1,500 a night for both facilities – subject to discount for non-profit groups – is too rich for some.

"It would cost $15,000 to put on a full production of a Jewish play and that's beyond us," said Fran Elliott, a founder of the Medina Theatre Ensemble.

Instead, Medina, which recently broadened its mandate from strictly Jewish content to cover plays concerned with the humanities, intends to concentrate on staged readings particularly in out-reach settings. As in other years, it will take part in Holocaust Education Week.

Fran Elliot

"We would like to do more in churches in the coming year," said Elliott.

The Leah Posluns Theatre is so busy that the 80 percent booking rate does not include all the times the theatre is used internally for meetings and concerts, said BJC executive director Deborah Pinsky.

It was also the scene this year of two movie shoots, which added to BJC coffers. One was the HBO effort The Passion of Ayn Rand, starring Helen Mirren, and the other was a commercial theatre feature called The Tin Man, starring Billy Bob Thornton and John Cusack.

But the booking rate does not impress Reva Tward, Leah

New theatre opens

Posluns' former artistic director, who claims there is now a lack of cohesiveness in Jewish theatre.

Now a novelist and screenplay writer, Tward says leaving Leah Posluns was a wrench. She recently directed a staged reading of There Comes a Time for Medina.

Wintrob is hopeful better times are ahead for the Jewish theatre scene. He cites the JTC's production of the play Hannah Senesh at the Bloor JCC, which attracted a total of 400 people for four performances, despite not being advertised.

The opening of a new theatre at the Bloor JCC is a good omen for Jewish theatre, Wintrob feels. Even before the theatre is built, the JTC will give staged readings of Suffer the Children by the winner of its annual playwriting contest, Maurice Breslow of Queen's University, on Nov. 30 in the afternoon at the Bloor JCC and in the evening at the BJC.

The JTC will continue its playwriting contest, even though it has attracted only about 20 entries in the past, not all of them well written.

The current winner, Suffer the Children, about the Lodz ghetto in Poland, is a "fascinating exploration" of a Holocaust theme, Wintrob said.

The theatre planned for the Bloor JCC will fill a need in other local ethnic communities, said Harold Green, director of the JCC's campaign for the new facilities.

The 275-seat theatre, designed by renowned architect Jerome Markson, will be divisible into two separate multi-purpose areas, both capable of utilizing 35 mm and 16 mm films and video equipment. The back half will have a sloped floor, while the front half will be flat with movable seats, stage and bimah.

"There is a definite need for Jewish content plays and the community wants them," said Janese Kane, artistic director of New Globe Theatre.

Her company produced two such plays, A Shayna Maidel and Sight Unseen, at the Ford Centre Studio Theatre, and lost money on both. But she is not sorry they were done.

"You don't make money in Jewish theatre," she said, "It's a labor of love."

As Kane points out, the number of Jewish actors and directors is still large, though some have had to go to Hollywood or New York to make their mark.

Sephardi Jews retain own unique cultural folklore

PERLITA ETTEDGUI
Special to The CJN

Sephardi culture is often associated with rich cultural folklore and a distinct religious tradition. A people unique in origin became recognized for the different ways in which they received the holy days, sang their songs and created their own awareness.

In today's fast paced, highly technological world, it is often necessary to find the relevance of age-old ideas within a current context. If Judaism becomes the sum of thousands of stories told through the generations, then being Sephardi undoubtedly becomes the experience of hearing and telling a sum of unique and personal stories, which serve to educate and connect.

The stories we tell each other about our past not only reveal where we come from, but they also carve out the directions we will take. Recently I had the pleasure of being immersed in hundreds of stories from the past as I watched two reunited family members reminisce about another time and a far-off place.

My great uncle from Israel was here visiting my grandmother, and the siblings who hadn't seen each other in over two decades became human time capsules, telling stories only they knew.

Sitting by them and listening to their memories was like viewing the carvings of a historical sculpture. Hearing them recount experiences of studying for Hebrew class recitals, of hurrying around the house preparing for Pesach and of him helping parade her around the one main street in Morocco on her wedding day took me somewhere I've never been before, but it was a place that was somehow always familiar to me.

The kinds of stories they told for hours on end were the same ones my mother always tells my brother and me about her grandparents. They are the stories I will probably tell my children one day. The content is not nearly as significant as the act of storytelling itself and the themes of ritual and myth creating a common thread.

I began to realize that these stories define the experience of being Sephardi and exemplify the notions of what values and customs are important enough to become a story.

One story that always sticks in my mind is the story of Sol the Zadikah, which, I only now realize, my mother recounted to me as a warning against intermarriage.

When I was younger, she used to narrate this fairy tale of a young, strong-willed girl who rejected a kingdom rather than marry the king of Morocco. I remember being very afraid as my mother softly told me of how this girl chose her death over conversion and the loss of her heritage.

Today I realize the metaphorical significance of the tale, but it still remains a story that encompasses a little bit of Sephardi culture, a little bit of history and a lot of continuity.

Through stories recounted from one generation to another, ancient religious dictums can perhaps achieve modern day relevance. These stories are increasingly finding their way into youth groups, with the aim of building the foundations for social and educational activities.

One of the most recently formed groups, Re'ut Organization of Toronto Sepharadim, attempts to motivate mingling and involvement within the Sephardi community through the heightened awareness of cultural principles. With the fitting acronym of ROOTS, this group is different from others in the emphasis it places on connecting the past to the present.

Como dise el refran: lo que siembres, recojeras, our saying goes: what you plant is what will blossom. The continuous planting of stories and recounting of tales plant the seeds for the interest in a heritage that is increasingly in danger of being weakened when placed in competition with so many more appealing preoccupations.

Bene Israel Congregation focal point for Jews of India

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On the Saturday night before Sabrina and Mark Kerbel were married, some 75 people gathered at her parents' home for the henna, or mehendi as Indian Jews call it, the traditional Sephardi pre-nuptial ceremony for beautifying the bride.

In an interview, Sabrina Kerbel said that the henna varies from one Sephardi group to another, but essentially the bride-to-be's hand or ring finger is painted with henna and she is adorned with flowers.

Her mehendi was rooted in the traditions of the Bene Israel, a group of Indian Jews whose presence in India can be traced back more than 2,000 years, she said.

Dressed in an ornately embroidered ceremonial outfit made in India especially for the occasion, Kerbel said she was showered with puffed rice and rose petals, which symbolized "the showering of good wishes" upon her.

She noted that the ceremony included common components of Bene Israel simchahs – a prayer for the prophet Elijah, and the malida, an offering to Elijah made of rose petals, cloves, five fruits and parched rice, which is flattened, dried, moistened and flavored with sugar and cardamom.

Many of the people attending Kerbel's mehendi were members of the Beth Israel of North America Congregation (BINA) founded 15 years ago by a small group of Indian Jews, among them Kerbel's parents, Ann and Sol Samson.

The Samsons had emigrated from Bombay and settled in Toronto in 1966 prior to the births of their two daughters, Kerbel and Fleur.

The congregation, originally made up of about 10 families, was established so that the parents could pass their traditions on to their children, Ann Samson said. "We felt there was a need for them to learn our own melodies and traditions. Otherwise they would be lost. That was the impetus to form the congregation."

The group started by celebrating Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur together, renting the National Council of Jewish Women building for that purpose. Council House continues to be the venue for BINA Congregation's services, which are only held on the High Holy Days and Simchat Torah, Samson said.

The largest Bene Israel congregation outside of Israel and India, the membership of BINA has grown to 80 families, drawing members from as far away as Montreal and New York, who maintain contact through the congregation's quarterly bulletin she said. The congregation increased following the immigration to Canada of younger Bene Israel families from India and Israel, she added.

Congregation president Diana Abraham told The CJN that many Bene Israel Jews living outside of Israel make a point of visiting family and friends in Toronto during the High Holy Days, coming from as far away as England and Vancouver, so that they can attend BINA services because they're nostalgic about their childhood traditions.

Like many congregation members Abraham's family is affiliated with another synagogue, she said, adding that her husband Victor, the lay leader of BINA and chair of the ritual services committee, will have to forgo services this year because he is also the president of the Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton, where they reside.

Abraham joked that her children Jordan, 27, and Ramona, 25, used to call themselves Ashkefasi because they went to an Ashkenazi day school, but followed Sephardi traditions at home.

She said her children are involved in BINA and there are also many younger people on the board and that is very gratifying because the younger generation will perpetuate the traditions.

Becoming the congregation vice-president was a natural progression, Kerbel said. "My parents were always involved. I always helped out with the newsletter. It was a natural extension to get involved with the board.

"I feel that I have a unique heritage of being Indian and Jewish. It's important to get the younger members involved – to learn the traditions and the melodies, or those traditions will get lost or watered down."

She noted that her 1992 wedding combined both the Ashkenazi and Sephardi traditions because husband Mark's background is Ashkenazi. The ceremony, which was conducted by two Ashkenazi rabbis at the Adath Israel, also reflected her family's Indian roots.

For instance, the congregation rose and recited part of Yigdal when the groom walked down the aisle as is customary at Indian weddings; and Mark in turn sang Navah Mikol, a Hebrew love poem, to her as she made her way to the chupah, she said.

Summer fun at the Centre of the City

The Centre Camp campsite of the Bathurst Jewish Centre was transformed last month for one very special day into a mini-Israel. The young campers were able to stop at a number of interactive stations and experience many different and instructive Israel experiences such as making pita at a Bedouin tent, inscribing and placing notes into the Western Wall, planting trees on a kibbutz, visiting an artists' colony in Safed, and taking a tour through Yad Vashem. Campers were also able to imprint their hands on the Peace Banner that was painted by artist Eric Azeroul. The day ended with camp-wide Israeli dancing.

Baycrest responds to new challenges

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A recent survey of the Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area indicates that people over age 85 have become the fastest growing group.

In his annual review, Stephen Herbert, president and chief executive officer of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, notes that a number of issues confronting Baycrest include a government policy shift from in-patient services to community-based care, and a widening gap between the levels of government funding and the centre's fiscal requirements.

"We know that seniors want and need more community services to help them preserve a lifetime of independence," says Herbert. "By taking advantage of the provincial government's shift in focus to community care, we are turning this challenge into an opportunity."

Baycrest's Jewish Home for the Aged (JHA), Abe & Elsie Posluns Building, which opened in 1968, has served the community's needs, says Herbert, but "because of the dramatically changing needs of an aging population, the physical, social and care environment no longer meet the high standards we have come to expect at Baycrest."

A new Jewish Home for the Aged being built on the Baycrest campus will provide an additional 100 special beds to address the needs of older adults whose cognitive abilities have been damaged by vascular dementia conditions such as strokes. The JHA will also continue serving the needs of those with a number of disorders such as Alzheimer disease.

The total cost of the New Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders will be $65 million – $31 million raised through Baycrest, as well as contributions by provincial and municipal governments.

Baycrest has developed partnerships with health care, social service and academic organizations in order to share knowledge and resources in the areas of care, research and education.

In its effort to expand services to the community, Baycrest operates home care services which provide nursing and other care in the homes of seniors, and a community recreation program in which Baycrest staff goes into selected apartment buildings and provides programs for otherwise isolated seniors.

As well, Baycrest has dentistry; chiropody; ear, nose and throat; orthopedic; and optical clinics open to the community.

Marvin Sadowski, recently elected chair of the centre's board of directors sees a continuing need to develop innovative housing options for seniors.

"We need to continue expanding our program of assisting seniors in their own homes, and we need to look at alternative ways of providing housing such as Two Neptune – a condominium-style complex being developed by Baycrest with the assistance of the Kehilla Residential Program.

"One of our main concerns is to ensure a quality of care for seniors that's in keeping with what we've always provided. That's uppermost."

BAYCREST VOLUNTEER

Fifteen year old Witby student Stephanie Smyth spent her summer working at Baycrest Centre as part of the centre's youth volunteer program, which drew 300 volunteers aged 13 to 25. She is seen here with Jewish Home for the Aged residents Dr. Larry Cohen and Sarah Mandel.

Numerous volunteering opportunities available

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

Feeling spiritually bereft? Need to reconnect with your community? Or are you just looking for some time away from the kids?

If you answered yes to any of the above and have even a little spare time, consider one of the myriad volunteer opportunities with Jewish organizations in the GTA.

It's crucial work.

Ruth Zaionz, a volunteer in Baycrest Centre's palliative care unit who started volunteering with a "desire to try to make a difference" in the community, says many organizations would face financial ruin if forced to hire staff to replace volunteers.

The mother of two grown children, ages 26 and 30, should know. She's seen the good work volunteers do, having given her time in the community since 1960.

It was the death of her grandfather that led Zaionz, now a grandmother herself, to start volunteering at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"I felt as if I owed something to the great big community at large, but I didn't know how to repay it," the lifelong Torontonian says.

She volunteered in Mt. Sinai's emergency ward until 1967, helping assess the severity of patient injuries and ailments as they came in the door.

After a gap of about 15 years for "children, babies, school, marriage" and sporadic employment as a title-searcher and at JNF and the Associated Hebrew Schools, she "developed an interest" in Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in the early 1980s, about the same time her husband, Charles, became Ontario regional chair.

Between 1992 and 1995, Zaionz chaired the CJC's committee on world Jewry and international affairs.

Her husband spearheaded the same committee's creation in the 1970s when three of his cousins – all brothers – were among those who "disappeared" during the Argentinian military dictatorship of the time.

He was "surprised," Zaionz says, to learn the CJC didn't have a mechanism to interact with its counterparts in countries other than Israel; so he helped create one.

The cousins' fate was especially distressing to the couple, since they had spent their honeymoon with the family.

Zaionz also spent 11 years from 1988 to 1996 volunteering one night a week with Tel-Aide, the Jewish crisis referral hotline.

It was a friend at Tel-Aide who suggested that Zaionz join her at Baycrest's palliative care unit, which she did in 1997. Zaionz says she and others act as "adjuncts" to the "stretched" nursing and social work staff.

"We're there to give unlimited TLC, to provide a left shoulder, and right shoulder, if necessary," says Zaionz, who averages about three hours a week on the ward.

After three hours of a general Baycrest orientation and five extra sessions of training for those volunteering in palliative care, volunteers become "surrogate friends and family" to terminally ill patients and their families, Zaionz says.

They help familiarize patients and family members with the unit, and take patients to concerts in Baycrest's atrium or for walks outside in the garden.

"Comfort care is the rule," says Zaionz. Much time is also spent talking to patients, keeping them company.

"Sometimes you can sit beside a patient and just be holding their hand and that can be more powerful than words," she says.

What keeps her coming back is the "dignity of the patients" and their families, as well as their many letters of thanks.

"This is the saddest time of their lives, and you know you're making a difference" by helping "to take the terror" out of dying, says Zaionz.

She concedes that its heart-rending nature makes working in the palliative unit "a very, very special type of volunteering. It's not for everyone."

She's seen her share of tears, she adds.

"In front of the patients, I will not cry, but I will cry privately."

For those interested, there's no shortage of important opportunities at Baycrest and at other agencies.

Synagogues and schools are obvious choices for fundraising and classroom or schoolyard help, as are the numerous organizations that raise money for Israel, such as the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem or the Jewish National Fund.

Women might try volunteering through Na'amat (636-5425) or Hadassah-WIZO (630-8373), which raise money and provide services to a range of recipients and have 27 clubs and 70 chapters respectively in the GTA. Both also run annual bazaars requiring many volunteers.

Na'amat in particular has an ongoing need for lawyers in its legal advisory clinic, to counsel women with a variety of legal problems.

And if you're worried about not having the skills for certain positions, often, as in Zaionz's case, agencies will provide appropriate training.

Volunteers, agencies get matched

[Cont'd from B16]

If you're not sure where you fit, try calling Shelly Rotman of the UJA Federation's human resources department (635-2883, ext. 137). It's her job to match prospective volunteers with community agencies.

"We call ourselves a Jewish referral service," Rotman says. "People come to us when they're not sure what's out there."

Keeping abreast of agencies' current needs, Federation directs prospective volunteers to the agencies who assess volunteers' strengths.

One evening a month, trained volunteers – of course – interview prospective recruits. About 85 percent of the approximately 250 people interviewed yearly are eventually placed in volunteer positions.

So where is the greatest need?

Rotman says drivers are always required by agencies like Senior Care (635-2860), Jewish Family and Child Services (JF&CS, 638-7800) and the Reena Foundation (905-889-6484) to drive people to medical appointments or deliver kosher meals on wheels to seniors.

Drivers are particularly needed to deliver meals in Thornhill, says Senior Care volunteer coordinator Arnold Foss.

Also in high demand, Rotman says, are visitors for seniors, through agencies like Senior Care, or the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living (225-2112), which has a respite program that gives caregivers a break of up to three hours once a week.

Chaplaincy visits are also a regular need, particularly around holiday time, when JF&CS makes a concerted effort to bring Judaic programming to seniors and the ill in residences and hospitals around the city.

Another major area of continuing need, she says, is for JF&CS big brothers and tutors. Rotman says demand for big sisters is not as acute; so many volunteers are often directed to JF&CS's Special Friend program where volunteers are paired with a what JF&CS volunteer coordinator Barbara Barak calls a "socially isolated adult."

Barak says JF&CS also has a number of specific needs, including an editor for a volunteer newsletter, a "sensitive person" to survey families' experiences with its hospice program (where support is provided for people who choose to die at home) and a "person who is sophisticated with language" who can return calls and explain "in lay terms" about a joint program with the Hospital for Sick Children studying behavior modification techniques for parents and children.

Edna Levitt, director of development for ORT Canada, part of the largest non-governmental vocational and technological training organization in the world, says her organization needs office volunteers.

The Reena Foundation also needs help with developmentally challenged clients in the day program at its Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Thornhill, says Arlene Margolese, manager of volunteer services and Judaic programming.

Volunteers are also needed for Reena's home buddies group home volunteer program, its family friends program (where families adopt clients who have no family of their own), and its PAL-unteers program, in which clients are matched big brother-style with a volunteer to form a long-lasting relationship.

As well, since most "hands-on" social service volunteers are women, Reena needs more male volunteers for "male bonding" with its predominantly male clientele.

Chaplaincy services lends a hand

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

This past year, some 150 volunteers of Chaplaincy services, a program of Jewish Family and Child Service, served more than 1,000 Jews in hospitals, nursing homes, prisons and many other Jewish and non-Jewish institutions.

Toby Maskowitz, coordinator of Chaplaincy Services who is responsible for the recruitment, training, supervision and statistical tracking of the volunteers and para-chaplains in more than 100 institutions says, "We bring a spark of Yiddishkeit through the commitment of our volunteers into all institutions where there are Jews."

As the liaison between volunteer groups and institution staff, Maskowitz ensures that the programs in each facility respond to the needs of the patients or residents.

Chaplaincy Services is funded by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress. It also provides services to people who are developmentally handicapped, psychiatric patients and to residents in homes for the aged.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services, is involved in rabbinical counselling, prayer and support to the patients, residents and family members. He works closely with the institutions, staff and clergy, and provides rabbinic consultations on medical-ethical problems.

Rabbi Weiss, a representative on interfaith committees, is a member of the Jewish Hospice program. "For whatever difficulties we as Jews experience, our faith and tradition can provide comfort, he says."

He adds that Jewish festival celebrations, Shabbat services and special programming such as Jewish Women in History, winemaking and Yiddish clubs are presented throughout Ontario "to enrich the lives of the most vulnerable and lonely in our community."

The chaplaincy team also provides training to volunteer synagogue members who do friendly visiting, shivah and comfort visits to congregants in their time of need, says Florence Weinberger, manager of communications for Jewish Family and Child Service.

"Letting people in institutions understand that the community has not forgotten them and that they are not alone is of great importance," she says.

Gemilut chesed (performing acts of loving kindness), says Rabbi Weiss, is a response to the need before the need is expressed. "Chaplaincy is an anticipation of what another Jew requires."

Maskowitz notes that "volunteers are needed to carry on and expand our activities." For more information on how you or your organization can help, contact Toby Maskowitz at 416 638-7800, ext. 287.

Downtown Jewish Community School to mark 20th year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO – The Downtown Jewish Community School, (DJCS) housed in the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) is gearing up for a year of 20th anniversary celebrations.

Joan Schoenfeld, founder, principal and funding chairperson of the school, says festivities will include a Sholom Aleichem show put on by Cameo Productions and directed by Aviva Ravel, and a big party with students, family and Jewish Community Centre members.

Also planned is a Tzedakah Day, when parents and students work together on tzedakah projects that may include working at a food bank or collecting old clothing. "This is an initiative of the Jewish Educator's Assembly and Camp Ramah and we hope that a number of schools will participate," says Schoenfeld.

She says the school, "the primary community afternoon school in downtown Toronto is a very special place. We participate in a lot of programs with the JCC which makes the students feel part of the community at large. Parents are encouraged to participate on committees, including adult education, holiday celebrations and Shabbat dinners. Parent participation teaches that the DJCS is not just about acquiring knowledge, but also about community. It is a community school in the true sense of the word."

The school, which started out with 47 students from kindergarten to Grade 3, now has an enrolment of over 350 students in a total of 27 Jewish studies and Hebrew classes and two high school classes. Most families live in the downtown area, and "a significant percentage are unaffiliated with other Jewish organizations," says Schoenfeld, who lives within walking distance of the school.

She says students at the school "learn that there are many ways to be Jewish by being taught about all streams of Judaism."

"...there are many ways to be Jewish"

The high school is taught by two rabbis – one semester by a Reconstructionist rabbi and one semester by an Orthodox rabbi – who discuss with the students on the first day what students would like to see on the curriculum. "The classes are directly relevant to the students because the rabbis discuss exactly what they want to know," says Schoenfeld.

Topics high school students have examined include: dialogue with teens from other religious traditions; how Christians view Jews and Judaism; religious zealotry in Israel and in North America; can you have Jewish culture without practicing Jewish religion?; the Israel-Palestinian accords, peace now or peace never; and is Jewish opposition to intermarriage a form of racism?

The school is affiliated with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education and students participate in programs sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education, Canadian Zionist Federation, Jewish Family & Child Service and the Jewish Community Centre, including local, regional and national Bible contests, the Zimriyah Choir Festival, the Rikudiyah Dance Festival, the Passover Food Drive and the UJA Federation Walk for Israel.

The DJCS is also "officially affiliated with the Bloor JCC's current building fundraising campaign," says Schoenfeld.

Kesher helps the unemployed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There is help right in the Jewish community for those looking for jobs, as well as for employers looking for personnel. And it doesn't cost a cent.

Kesher, a privately sponsored organization, has been around for some years, according to executive director Howard Kurlandski, but just over three years ago, it was "revitalized. It became more structured, more focused."

Kesher is "an Orthodox-based institution trying to provide service to Jews across the board," Kurlandski explained.

The sponsors, who prefer to remain anonymous, felt strongly that "there should be a mechanism to help people in need who need a job."

There used to be a stigma attached to being unemployed, he said. "Now, just look around you. There are many many talented, qualified people who find themselves out of work."

It's like arranging a marriage, he mused, saying that the goal here is to help both people and businesses.

Kesher works with employers, finding out what skills they are looking for and what type of person would fit into their business.

"We are not interested in making placements for the sake of making placements. We want to make sure that both sides benefit," Kurlandski said.

When a successful match is made, everyone benefits, he said, including the person, who gets his self-respect back, the company, the family, even the country.

Les Kagan knows that feeling. Now working as a comptroller in a position that Kesher helped him find, he remembers when he didn't have a job. "I wanted to know how to keep my life together," he said. "Nobody wants to go on unemployment."

When he met Kurlandski for the first time, Kagan handed him his resume. "Howard said he could see that I was qualified, but not from that resume."

After he updated his resume using suggestions made by Kesher, Kagan started a temporary position. When that position ended, he went back, and with Kesher's help, found his current position, in which he feels very happy.

Looking for jobs through the newspapers or other job postings is "worse than useless," he said. "Fewer than one-third of all jobs available are advertised."

Kagan now uses Kesher when he himself is looking for staff. "Anyone who doesn't use this service is losing out," he believes.

Many of those using Kesher's services are professionals, Kurlandski said, such as lawyers, accountants, and engineers. Others are looking for basic or entry level type positions.

While Kesher has had a lot of success, Kurlandski said (since the start of 1998, they have been very busy indeed, he reported), "a major stumbling block is that we have to get the word out more effectively that we exist and that we are a viable resource."

You don't have to actually own a business to help. "Keep your eyes and ears open, and let us know when a position is available or when someone is looking for a job."

While helping someone get a job is a big mitzvah (it is the most exalted level of tzedakah, according to Maimonides), it makes sense in a business way too, as there is no charge either for the person or the organization.

Kesher works both directly and indirectly, Kurlandski said. Sometimes, Kesher does the initial phone calls and arranges for resumes to be sent and interviews to be scheduled.

JNF blue boxes aid ecology

DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Student Intern

For a 97 year-old, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) is pretty hip – after all, it's been into "blue boxes" long before they were cool.

The organization's mandate is to worry about Israel's ecology, as it has since JNF was founded at the 1901 Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland.

But it needs continued support to keep doing its work with land, water, trees and wildlife, says Ben Prossin, executive director of JNF's Ontario region.

"We hope people will continue to recognize, as they have for 97 years, that the work of the JNF is important in providing for a strong and beautiful Israel, not only in an environmental sense, but in preserving the land for the future," he says.

It's an impressive legacy. Since 1948, JNF has raised enough funds worldwide to plant over 200 million trees in Israel. It plants 3.5 million trees a year on average, Prossin says.

"We're very proud of the fact that Israel is the only country in the world that will have more trees on its territory at the end of the 20th century than it had at the beginning," says Prossin.

It's all a result of "those pennies that were put in blue boxes and pushkas" over the years by Jews around the world, he says.

This year's priority is an international project called the Jubilee Forest, located in the Negev between Beersheva and Arad next to Toronto's community forest. Once full, it will be the largest forest ever planted by the JNF.

Prossin notes JNF has built more than 100 dams and reservoirs in Israel over the last 20 years, a crucial need in Israel's desert terrain to catch rainfall that would otherwise run off into the sand.

The reservoirs not only provide water for agriculture, but many are also used as fish ponds, providing, Prossin jokes, much of Israel's yom tov supply of gefilte fish.

With its 750-billion NIS ($275 million) annual budget, JNF also helps build Israel's infrastructure, having financed 8,000 kilometres worth of roads since 1948, mostly connecting rural areas and small towns with central Israel.

It also supplies Israelis and tourists with parks and picnic areas, and is a major employer, particularly of new Ethiopian and Russian olim as tree planters.

"We've had scientists planting trees who've gone on to work at the Weizmann Institute," Prossin says.

JNF Israeli shaliach to Toronto Yaen Vered, who is nearing the end of the first year in a three-year term, notes that because of JNF's Negev tree planting research – "the most arid land in the world" because of its high clay content, he says – Israel now exports its anti-desertification techniques of irrigation, forestation and reforestation worldwide through the multilateral Arid Lands Consortium.

He notes that the demands of absorption over the last 50 years have "meant that central Israel became, unfortunately, a huge megacity…a concrete jungle." As a result, the reclamation of the Negev desert for settlement and agriculture is a top JNF priority.

As part of its ongoing Action Plan Negev, and as an offshoot of peace with Jordan, JNF is financing large-scale importation of Jordanian soil. The ultimate goal is to one day re-cover the entire Negev with soil capable of sustaining trees and agriculture, "because these are the only land reserves that Israel has," Vered says.

Another major project is in the Chula valley, where JNF's work to drain swamps in the 1950s and '60s was found to be ecologically harmful.

"Sometimes you shouldn't fool with mother nature," Prossin says. "We drained the swamp. It was a mistake. Let's admit it."

To rectify the damage caused to the local ecosystem, JNF is re-flooding some areas with water and recreating wildlife areas, complete with imported plants and animals as well as a bird sanctuary, since the area is on a transcontinental migratory bird path.

"It was what the Chula was except on a smaller scale…and except for the mosquitoes," says Vered.

JNF "hesitates" to reveal precise fundraising figures, because it doesn't want potential donors to think it doesn't need funds, Vered says.

However, Prossin says JNF fundraising is ahead of last year, having "already seen a spike" because of Israel's 50th anniversary.

He hopes a post-50th dropoff in donations and tree plantings doesn't happen, but says JNF will address the problem "if and when such a thing occurs."

Long-term donation trends show steady increases over time, both for JNF overall and for Toronto in particular, says Prossin.

JNF has not been affected by arguments suggesting Israel's near-First World economy and rising living standards mean it no longer needs outside financial assistance, he says.

Vered rejects such arguments in any case, saying Israel has special needs not faced by other countries, like defence and immigrant absorption, the latter of which "can't be done on the backs of people who live [there]."

Because of these pressing needs, say Vered and Prossin, the government does not have funds for many environmental projects.

"Israel has a very high tax burden," Prossin says. "So, while its economy is somewhat robust, it's considered on the fringes to worry about things like forests and trees. That's where we come in."

A major part of JNF's fundraising year is its annual Negev Dinner, to take place here this year on Nov. 29, the anniversary of the UN vote to partition Palestine.

A key theme is the number 50: it's the 50th Negev Dinner, coinciding with Israel's 50th anniversary, and one week after the dinner, its honoree, longtime community activist Allan Silber, turns 50.

JNF Toronto also has a new president, Sandy Posluns, who recently replaced Tom Ungar for a three year term.

Lipa Green Building still hub of Jewish activities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Most people who go to the Lipa Green Jewish Community Services building, located at 4600 Bathurst St., are unaware of the wealth of cultural and service agencies housed there.

The Lipa Green building, which opened in the summer of 1983, is home to agencies previously located at 150 Beverley St., as well as other community organizations.

Susan Jackson, director of continuity, and assistant director of Community Planning and Allocations of UJA Federation, who has worked in the Jewish community for more than 16 years, was our guide on a recent tour of the building.

"The building is the hub of Jewish activities in the community," says Jackson. "Along with numerous agencies, Lipa Green is the head office for satellite offices and services which have expanded to serve the needs of those throughout the community, particularly newly developed areas such as York Region."

Jackson notes that many agencies are interrelated. "As an example, someone coming to the Lipa Green Building to pick up a kashrut directory at the Kashruth Council of Toronto may [have found] the Kashruth Council through Shalom Toronto, a program run by the Jewish Women's Federation of UJA Federation.

"The Lipa Green Building is a group of agencies and services working together for community," says Jackson.

When you enter the building from Bathurst Street, you are on the fourth floor. The building, set in a ravine, has the main floor entrance on the west side where information and security are found.

On the second floor, where the Kashruth Council, the Jewish National Fund and Board of Jewish Education are located, there is also the Jewish Media Centre, which provides cultural and educational materials to teachers, organizations and individuals.

The third floor has a variety of offices including the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park (Pardes Shalom Cemetery), Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and United Restitution Organization.

The fourth floor houses the Canadian Jewish Congress and many cultural services including the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library; the Holocaust Educational and Memorial Centre; the Oskar Asher Schmidt Museum, which displays Holocaust material; the Ontario Jewish Archives; seminar and meeting rooms; and a conference centre.

On the fifth floor is UJA Federation, and on the sixth floor are the offices of Jewish Family & Child Service. The building also has other agencies including UIA Federations and the Canada Israel Experience Centre. Within many agencies there are numerous divisions, professional and voluntary committees and resource areas.

"The Lipa Green Building is a place where we see our strengths and commonalties as opposed to our differences," says Jackson. "This is community working for community."

The building is next to the neighboring Bathurst Jewish Centre, which has a kosher Second Cup and kosher cafeteria, the Koffler Centre for the Arts and the Leah Posluns Theatre.

"The Lipa Green Building is a wonderful place to work," she says. "The building provides an opportunity to connect all parts of your identity."

Kesher helps unemployed

They also help prepare or improve resumes, hone interviewing skills, and discuss job seeking ideas.

"We concentrate on finding full-time jobs," he said, but "many part-time jobs turn into full-time ones."

Most individuals looking for jobs are referred by another person, a rabbi, or an agency.

"First we talk on the phone. Then we have a personal interview, where we discuss skills like resume making and how to handle an interview.

"A person may be an expert in his or her field, but not in job seeking skills," he said.

Kurlandski feels it is very important to treat clients with "respect. We listen to them and we try our best to help."

There is a plethora of printouts to help the client prepare him or herself for job hunting.

Advice ranges from researching your potential employer, focusing on your accomplishments, and the importance of networking, to sending the interviewer a thank-you note.

Anne McIsaac, office manager for Zeifman & Co., an accounting and management firm, noted that Kesher always sent candidates who "looked and acted professional. They sent good people with good qualifications."

DOORWAYS FOR GENERATIONS...

"And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates."
Deuteronomy VI, 9

In the mezuzah resides the ultimate spirit of Jewish home life - that which makes a house a Jewish home. Placing a mezuzah on your own door-post is a religious duty. Creating a mezuzah and dedicating it to others is a mitzvah.

The Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders will be a facility to take us into the next century. The Women's Auxiliary of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has pledged there will be a mezuzah on every door and has launched this project to let everyone in the community share in making this a truly Jewish home.

From generation to generation...

Specially-commissioned mezuzah cases, designed by two of Toronto's leading ceramic artists, are now being hand-painted by the young-at-heart at Baycrest and by young people who are the next generation of our community. For ten times chai ($180) you can donate a mezuzah for one of the doorways in our new Home, purchase one for your own home or for someone else. What a wonderful way to honour a grandchild, parent or friend, to celebrate a simcha, mark a milestone or cherish the memory of someone near and dear. A beautiful certificate will be sent to commemorate your thoughtfulness and generosity.

From heart to heart...

By donating one or more of these uniquely designed, hand-painted mezuzahs, you and your family will be part of our new Home for years to come. The mezuzahs, containing a kosher parchment, will welcome and "protect" the generations that pass through its portals.

Funds raised from The Baycrest Mezuzah Project will help us build The Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders.
Tax receipts will be issued.

Don't pass up this opportunity to perform a mitzvah and preserve our heritage. Use the order form conveniently enclosed, call (416) 785-2500 Ext. 2003 or Fax (416) 785-2373.
